TO

THE FOURTH EDITION.

IN PREPARING this Edition for the press, the system adopted by the Author has been followed as nearly as could be; and the Statutes and Cases have been introduced in a manner similar to that which the Author himself pursued in preparing the Second Edition; but although the Editor has used his best endeavours to keep the work within as narrow limits as were consistent with giving a full and correct statement of the Statutes and Cases, which the twenty-two years since the last Edition have produced, yet the number of those Statutes and Cases is so great as to render a third volume unavoidable. This the Editor extremely regrets, but he felt himself bound to adhere to the plan of the Author, and the more especially as that plan affords to the reader the fullest and most useful view of the enactments and decisions.

Great difficulty has been experienced in many instances in giving a faithful representation of the decisions. The marginal notes have been so rarely found to be warranted by the cases themselves, that they have generally been omitted: and the Editor has endeavoured, so far as the reports enabled him, to give such a statement of the facts, the decision, and the grounds of it, wherever they appeared, as to enable the reader to understand what the decision, as reported, really is; but many cases are so loosely and inaccurately reported that this has been no easy task, and very probably the Editor has not always succeeded in his attempt. Nor can it be doubted that, in some instances, the reports themselves neither fully nor faithfully represent the facts or the decision.

All the Sections of the Statutes, which are set forth in the work and in the Appendix, have either been printed from a copy of the Statutes themselves, or compared with them by Messrs. Spottiswoode, in the hopes that by this means the greatest accuracy might be secured.

As the work is confined to indictable offences, and does not treat of criminal procedure, the Statutes relating to the summary conviction of offenders have not been introduced.

The enactments as to sending juvenile offenders to reformatories are placed in the Appendix of Statutes, Vol. III. p. xiii.

In order to introduce the latest decisions, the Law Times Reports have been used, and sometimes on the day of publication; and it is but right to say that, considering the celerity with which these Reports are published, they are very creditable productions.

The cases, which were decided too late to be inserted in their proper places in the body of work, will be found in the Appendix in the Third Volume. Their names are inserted in the Table of Cases in that Volume, and they are also referred to in the General Index.

The pages of the last Edition have been inserted in the margin of the present, in order that any one may find the passages in this Edition, which were in the former Edition and have been referred to in any other book.

In some instances pages referred to in the notes are printed between brackets; these references are to the pages of the last Edition; and by this means references have been given to subsequent parts of the work, which had not been printed when the references were made.

At the beginning of the First Volume a chapter has been introduced which contains certain general provisions applicable to many of the offences treated of in the work. This has been done in order to facilitate the reference to these provisions wherever it may be necessary. Among these provisions are those relating to penal servitude. The last Act on that subject passed after a considerable portion of this work had been printed, and, in order to render the inconvenience caused thereby as small as possible, a page has been cancelled, and the provisions of this statute introduced in their proper place in this chapter. It was out of the question to cancel and reprint every page where this statute altered the term of penal servitude; and it is trusted that the insertion of the new enactments in this chapter will answer every practical purpose.

Some new chapters and sections have been introduced wherever any new enactments seemed to render it expedient; and in these the main object has been to insert the enactments in such a manner as seemed most likely to be generally useful in practice.

The cases marked 'MSS. C. S. G.' are from the Editor's collection.

The Editor would be doing great injustice to himself if he were not to express the very deep sense he entertains of the great honour which was done to him by the very flattering manner in which his labours in the last Edition were appreciated, not only in Her Majesty's dominions, but also in the United States. He has endeavoured in this Edition to show the sense he feels of the honour done to him by rendering it as complete and perfect as he was able.

It has been also a matter of great gratification that during the time this work has been passing through the press, the Editor has been able to lend his humble assistance towards the completion of the new Code of Criminal Law for the State of New York; for which he has received as flattering an acknowledgment as possible from the Commissioners, who have shown so much ability in the preparation of that great work. The Editor cannot but express the hope that such mutual interchanges of goodwill in the endeavour to ameliorate the law, may exert a strong tendency to promote those feelings of amity which ought ever to subsist between the kindred nations of Great Britain and the United States; nor can he help thinking that they who, amid the din of arms, where generally the laws stand in abeyance, have sedulously devoted themselves to the amendment of their laws, must be deeply impressed with the truth contained in the beautiful lines—

Pax optima rerum
Quas homini novisse datum est; pax una triumphis
Innumeris potior.

TO

THE SECOND EDITION.

A SECOND EDITION of this Treatise has long been delayed by the pressure of professional engagements, and by the changes effected in the criminal laws during several successive sessions of Parliament. It has of course been an object that it should embrace, as far as possible, the statutes of consolidation and improvement, for which the country is so much indebted to the able and judicious exertions of Mr. Peel.

‘ The crime of high treason was not originally included in the plan of this work, on account of the great additional space which the proper discussion of that important subject would have occupied; and because prosecutions for that crime—happily not frequent—are always so conducted as to give sufficient time to consult the highest authorities.’ These reasons, which were given in the Preface to the First Edition, have still been allowed to operate; and the crime of high treason is not, therefore, one of the subjects discussed in the following pages. The law upon all other indictable offences will, it is hoped, be there found in an appropriate arrangement: and a chapter or book upon the Law of Evidence in criminal prosecutions, which formed a part of the original plan of the work, has now been supplied by the kind assistance of my friend, Mr. E. Vaughan Williams, whose professional attainments abundantly assure the value of the addition.

A TREATISE ON CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS.

BOOK THE FIRST.

OF PERSONS CAPABLE OF COMMITTING CRIMES, OF PRINCIPALS AND ACCESSORIES, AND OF INDICTABLE OFFENCES.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

THERE are certain general enactments applicable to many offences, which are collected in this chapter in order that, instead of being frequently repeated at length, and thereby increasing the size of the work, they may be referred to in this place whenever it may be necessary.

By the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, 'if on the trial of any person charged with any felony or misdemeanor it shall appear to the jury upon the evidence that the defendant did not complete the offence charged, but that he was guilty only of an attempt to commit the same, such person shall not by reason thereof be entitled to be acquitted, but the jury shall be at liberty to return as their verdict that the defendant is not guilty of the felony or misdemeanor charged, but is guilty of an attempt to commit the same, and thereupon such person shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for attempting to commit the particular felony or misdemeanor charged in the said indictment; and no person so tried as herein lastly mentioned shall be liable to be afterwards prosecuted for an attempt to commit the felony or misdemeanor for which he was so tried.'

Under this clause the defendant can only be convicted of the attempt to commit the very offence with which he is charged. Upon an indictment for breaking and entering the house of M. Fowler, and stealing therein eight spoons, one dress, &c., it appeared that the prisoner broke and entered the house, but that all the articles mentioned in the indictment had been stolen from the house before the time when the prisoner so broke and entered it; there were, however, other goods of the prosecutor's in the house at that time; and it was held that the prisoner could not be convicted of an attempt under this clause; for such an attempt must be to do that which if successful would amount to the felony or misdemeanor charged in the indictment; and here the attempt could not have succeeded, as the things which the indictment charged the prisoner with stealing had been previously removed. (a)

Upon a trial for felony the jury can only convict of an attempt which is a misdemeanor, and not of an attempt which is made felony by statute. Thus, on an indictment for murder with poison, the prisoner cannot be convicted of feloniously administering poison to the deceased with intent to murder him. (b)

Trial, &c. of offences committed on the sea.

Each of the Consolidation Acts 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 115; c. 97, s. 72; c. 98, s. 50; c. 99, s. 36; and c. 100, s. 68, contains the following clause:—

‘All indictable offences mentioned in this Act which shall be committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England or Ireland shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature and liable to the same punishments as if they had been committed upon the land in England or Ireland, and may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in any county or place in England or Ireland in which the offender shall be apprehended or be in custody, in the same manner in all respects as if they had been actually committed in that county or place; and in any indictment for any such offence, or for being an accessory to such an offence, the venue in the margin shall be the same as if the offence had been committed in such county or place, and the offence shall be averred to have been committed “on the high seas:” Provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect any of the laws relating to the government of Her Majesty’s land or naval forces.’

The Coin Act, c. 99, which extends to Scotland, in sec. 36, adds ‘Where any of the crimes and offences or high crimes and offences mentioned in this Act, shall be committed at sea, and the vessel in which the same shall be committed shall be registered in Scotland, or touch at any part thereof, the Courts of Criminal Law of Scotland may inquire, try, and determine the same in the same manner as if such crime and offence, or high crime and offence, had been committed in Scotland.’

These enactments were framed on the similar clauses contained in the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 77; 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 43; 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 32; 9 Geo. 4, c. 55, s. 74 (I.); 9 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 55 (I.); and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 41 (I.); together with the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2. Some of these enactments simply provide for the trial of offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty; whilst others provide in addition, that the offences mentioned in the Act, which shall be committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature, and liable to the same punishments as if they had been committed upon the land in England or Ireland. It seems clear that, wherever an Act creates new offences, this is the proper enactment; for, though in the case of offences against the laws of nature and nations, such as murder or piracy committed

(a) Reg. v. M’Pherson, 1 D. & B. 197.

(b) Reg. v. Connell, 6 Cox C. C. 178, Williams and Talfourd, JJ.

on the seas, the general course of legislation has been simply to provide for their trial, and no doubt correctly, because, in the eye of the law of England, they were offences of the same nature as if they had been committed on land in England, yet it may well be doubted whether that be sufficient in the case of newly created offences; and it is certainly much safer to have the provision with which this clause commences.

The 39 Geo. 3, c. 37, s. 1, no doubt provides generally, that every offence committed upon the high seas shall be of the same nature, &c., as if it had been committed on shore, but it is by no means clear that that enactment applies to any offence created by a subsequent statute, and it was much better not to leave the matter open to any such question.

Under these clauses the Court of Quarter Sessions has authority to try any offender apprehended or in custody within their local jurisdiction for any offence committed on the sea, which they might have tried if it had been committed within that jurisdiction. A prisoner committed a larceny on board the British vessel Candia whilst on the high seas, and was apprehended within the borough and county of Southampton, and it was held that the Court of Quarter Sessions for that borough and county had authority to try him for that offence. (c)

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, s. 8, 'every person convicted of any felony, for which no punishment hath been or hereafter may be specially provided, shall be deemed to be punishable under this Act, and shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be transported (cc) beyond the seas for the term of seven years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years; and if a male, to be once, twice, or thrice publicly or privately whipped (if the Court shall so think fit) in addition to such imprisonment.'

Of the punishment for felonies for which no special punishment is otherwise provided.

By sec. 9, 'where any person shall be convicted of any offence punishable under this Act, for which imprisonment may be awarded, it shall be lawful for the Court to sentence the offender to be imprisoned, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, in the common gaol or house of correction, and also to direct that the offender shall be kept in solitary confinement for the whole or any portion or portions of such imprisonment, or of such imprisonment with hard labour, as to the Court in its discretion shall seem meet.'

But by the 1 Vict. c. 90, s. 5, 'it shall not be lawful for any Court to direct that any offender shall be kept in solitary confinement for any longer periods than one month at a time, or than three months in the space of one year.'

Where a prisoner is sentenced to solitary confinement under these clauses the sentence should specify the time at which such confinement is to commence as well as the term for which it is to last.

An opinion at one time prevailed that it was expedient to award to certain offences fixed terms of transportation or imprisonment, and many statutes were passed containing such fixed terms. That opinion afterwards was abandoned, and in consequence the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 24, s. 1, was passed, which, after reciting that 'in certain cases of felony the Court is not empowered by law to award sentence of transportation for a less period than the term of the offender's life or some long term of years, or sentence of imprisonment for any shorter term than two years; but it is desirable that some such offenders should suffer transportation or imprisonment for a shorter period respectively, at the discretion of the Court before which they are convicted,' enacts that 'in all cases where the Court is now (26th June, 1846) empowered or required to award a sentence of transportation exceeding seven years, it shall be lawful for such Court, at its discretion, to award a sentence of transportation for a term of years not less than seven years, or to award such sentence of imprisonment for any period not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, as shall to the Court in its discretion appear just under all the circumstances.'

By the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, penal servitude was introduced in lieu of transportation in certain cases and under certain regulations; but sec. 1, 2, 3, and 4 of that Act which made these provisions were repealed by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 1, and by sec. 2 of this Act, 'no person shall be sentenced to transportation; and any person who [if the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, had not been passed] might have been sentenced to transportation, shall be liable to be sentenced to be kept in penal servitude for a term of the same duration as the term of transportation to which such person would have been liable if the said [Acts] had not been passed; and in every case where at the discretion of the Court one of any two or more terms of transportation might have been awarded, the Court shall have the like discretion to award one of any two or more of the terms of penal servitude which are hereby authorised to be awarded instead of such terms of transportation: Provided always, that any person who might at the discretion of the Court have been sentenced either to transportation for any term or to any period of imprisonment, shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be sentenced either to penal servitude for the same term or to the same period of imprisonment; and in any case in which before the passing of the (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99) sentence of seven years' transportation might have been passed, it shall be lawful for the Court at its discretion to pass a sentence of penal servitude of not less than three years.'

The 27 & 28 Vict. c. 47 recites the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99 and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, and by sec. 1, 'this Act shall be construed as one with the above mentioned Acts.'

Length of sentences, penal servitude.

Sec. 2. 'No person shall be sentenced to penal servitude in respect to any offence committed after the passing of this Act for a period of less than five years; and where under any Act now in force a period of less than five years is the utmost sentence of penal servitude that can be awarded, a period of five years shall, in respect to any offence committed after the passing of this Act, in such Act be substituted for the less period; and where under any Act now in force a period of either less or more than five years may be awarded as a sentence of penal servitude, the least sentence of penal servitude that can be awarded under that Act shall, in respect to any offence committed after the passing of this Act, be a period of five years; and where any person shall on indictment be convicted of any crime or offence punishable with penal servitude, after having been previously convicted of felony, or, in Scotland, of any crime (whether such previous conviction shall have taken place upon an indictment or under the provisions of the Act passed in the eighteenth and nineteenth of Victoria, chapter one hundred and twenty-six), the least sentence of penal servitude that can be awarded in such case shall be a period of seven years.'

Sec. 4. If any holder of a license granted in the form in the schedule is convicted, either by verdict of a jury or upon his own confession, of any offence for which he is indicted, his license shall be forthwith forfeited by virtue of such conviction, or if any holder of a license granted under any of the Penal Servitude Acts shall, unless prevented by illness or other unavoidable cause, fail to report himself personally, if in Great Britain to the chief police station of the borough or police division, and if in Ireland to the constabulary station of the locality, to which he may go within three days after his arrival therein, and being a male subsequently once in each month at such time and place, in such manner and to such person as the chief officer of the constabulary force to which such station belongs shall appoint, or shall change his residence from one police district to another without having previously notified the same to the police or constabulary station to which he last reported himself, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be summarily convicted thereof, and his license shall be forthwith forfeited by virtue of his conviction, but he shall not be liable to any other punishment by virtue of such conviction.

Forfeiture of license.

Sec. 5. 'If any holder of a license granted in the form set forth in the said Schedule (A.)—

'1. Fails to produce his license when required to do so by any judge, justice of the peace, sheriff, sheriff substitute, police or other magistrate before whom he may be brought charged with any offence, or by any constable or officer of the police in whose custody he may be, and also fails to make any reasonable excuse why he does not produce the same; or

'2. Breaks any of the other conditions of his license by any Act that is not of itself punishable either upon indictment or upon summary conviction;

Offences by holders of a license.

he shall be deemed guilty of an offence punishable summarily by imprisonment for any period not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour.'

Sec. 6. Any constable or police officer may, without warrant, apprehend any holder of a license whom he may reasonably suspect of having committed any offence, or of having broken any of the conditions of his license, and may take him before a justice to be dealt with according to law.

Sec. 7. When the holder of a license is convicted of an offence punishable summarily under this or any other Act a certificate thereof is to be forwarded to a secretary of state in Great Britain or to the lord lieutenant in Ireland, and thereupon the license may be revoked.

Effect of forfeiture or revocation of license.

Sec. 9. 'Where any license granted in the form set forth in the said Schedule (A.) is forfeited by a conviction of any indictable offence, or is revoked in pursuance of a summary conviction under this Act or any other Act of Parliament, the person whose license is forfeited or revoked shall, after undergoing any other punishment to which he may be sentenced for the offence in consequence of which his license is forfeited or revoked, further undergo a term of penal servitude equal to the portion of his term of penal servitude that remained unexpired at the time of his license being granted, and shall, for the purpose of his undergoing such last-mentioned punishment, be removed from the prison of any county, borough, or place in which he may be confined, to any prison in which convicts under sentence of penal servitude may lawfully be confined, by warrant under the hand and seal of any justice of the peace of the said county, borough, or place, and shall be liable to be there dealt with in all respects as if such term of penal servitude had formed part of his original sentence.'

Licenses may be granted in a different form from that in the schedule.

Sec. 10 empowers Her Majesty or the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to grant licenses in any other form than that in the schedule and containing different conditions; and such licenses shall be revokable at pleasure by the authority by which they were granted; but a breach of their conditions is not to subject any holder of a license to summary conviction.

This Act appears to have been anything rather than well considered. In the case of larceny and sundry other offences penal servitude for three years was the highest punishment which could be inflicted, and the effect of this Act is to raise all those punishments to five years penal servitude. Cases may, no doubt, occur where this may be a proper punishment; but there may be others where the offender deserves less than five years penal servitude and more than two years imprisonment, and cases of this kind may occur in every case where penal servitude may be awarded under the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts, for they give penal servitude for not less than three years, or imprisonment not exceeding two years. In a case where a convict deserves more than two years hard labour and less than five years penal servitude, no Court will ever pass more than the convict deserves, and consequently it must pass less than he deserves; this is a very palpable mistake in the statute.

Hard labour.

Each of the Consolidation Acts, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 118; c. 97, s. 74; c. 98, s. 52; c. 99, s. 39, and c. 100, s. 69, contains the following clause:—

'Whenever imprisonment, with or without hard labour, may be awarded for any indictable offence under this Act, the Court may sentence the offender to be imprisoned, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, in the common gaol or house of correction.'

Each of the Consolidation Acts, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 119; c. 97, s. 75; c. 98, s. 53; c. 99, s. 40, and c. 100, s. 70, contains the following clause:—

'Whenever solitary confinement may be awarded for any indictable offence under this Act, the Court may direct the offender to be kept in solitary confinement for any portion or portions of his imprisonment, or of his imprisonment with hard labour, not exceeding one month at any one time, and not exceeding three months in any one year.'

Each of the Consolidation Acts 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 119; c. 97, s. 75; c. 100, s. 70, contains the following clause:—

'Whenever whipping may be awarded for any indictable offence under this Act, the Court may sentence the offender to be once privately whipped; and the number of strokes, and the instrument with which they shall be inflicted, shall be specified by the Court in the sentence.'

'Whenever any person shall be convicted of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, in addition to or in lieu of any of the punishments by this Act authorised, fine the offender, and require him to enter into his own recognizances, and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace and being of good behaviour; and in case of any felony punishable under this Act, (a) the Court may, if it shall think fit, require the offender to enter into his own recognizances, and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace in addition to any punishment by this Act authorised: Provided that no person shall be imprisoned under this clause for not finding sureties for any period exceeding one year.'

Each of the Consolidation Acts 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 98; c. 97, s. 56; c. 98, s. 49; c. 99, s. 35, and c. 100, s. 67, enacts that 'In the case of every felony punishable under this Act, every principal in the second degree, and every accessory before the fact, shall be punishable in the same manner as the principal in the first degree is by this Act punishable; and every accessory after the fact to any felony punishable under this Act (b) shall be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement; (c) and whosoever shall counsel, aid, or abet the commission of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act shall be liable to be proceeded against, indicted, and punished as a principal offender.' (d)

Punishment of principals in the second degree, and accessories.

(a) The Offences Against the Person Act, s. 71, here adds, 'otherwise than with death.'

(b) Accessories after the fact to murder and the receivers of stolen goods are excepted.

(c) The Offences Against the Person Act and Coin Act omit solitary confinement.

(d) This clause is omitted in the Coin Act, but the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 8, supplies the omission. Post, p. 70.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF PERSONS CAPABLE OF COMMITTING CRIMES.

- [1] It is a general rule that no person shall be excused from punishment for disobedience to the laws of the country, unless he be expressly defined and exempted by the laws themselves. (a) The inquiry, therefore, as to those who are capable of committing crimes, will best be disposed of by considering the several pleas and excuses which may be urged on behalf of a person who has committed a forbidden act, as grounds of exemption from punishment.

Want or defect of will.

Those pleas and excuses must be founded upon the want or defect of will in the party by whom the act has been committed. For without the consent of the will, human actions cannot be considered as culpable; nor where there is no will to commit an offence, is there any just reason why a party should incur the penalties of a law made for the punishment of crimes and offences. (b) The cases of want or defect of will seem to be reducible to four heads:—I. Infancy. II. Non compos mentis. III. Subjection to the power of others. IV. Ignorance.

Infants committing misdemeanors.

I. The full age of man or woman by the law of England is twenty-one years: (c) under which age a person is termed an infant, and is exempted from punishment in some cases of misdemeanors and offences that are not capital. (d) But the nature of the offence will make differences which should be observed.

- [2] Thus, if it be any notorious breach of the peace, as a riot, battery, or the like, an infant above the age of fourteen is equally liable to suffer as a person of the full age of twenty-one; (e) and if an infant judicially perjure himself in point of age, or otherwise, he shall be punished for the perjury; and he may be indicted for cheating with false dice, &c.: (f) but if the offence charged by the indictment be a mere non-feazance (unless it be of such a thing as the party be bound to by reason of tenure or the like, as to repair a bridge, &c.) (g), there, in some cases, he shall be privileged by his non-age, if under twenty-one, though above fourteen years; because laches in such a case shall not be imputed to him. (h)

It is said that if an infant of the age of eighteen years be convicted of a disseisin with force, yet he shall not be imprisoned; (i) and the law is said to be, that though an infant at the age of eighteen or even fourteen, by his own acts may be guilty of a forcible entry, and may be fined for the same, yet he cannot be imprisoned, because his infancy is an excuse by reason of his indiscretion; and it is not particularly mentioned in the statute against forcible entries, that he shall be committed for such fine. (j) An infant cannot, however, be guilty of a forcible entry or disseisin by barely commanding one, or by assenting to one to his use; because every command or assent of this kind by a person under such incapacity is void: but an actual entry by an infant into another's freehold gains the possession and makes him a disseisor. (k)

With regard to capital crimes the law is more minute and circumspect; distinguishing with greater nicety the several degrees of age and discretion: though the capacity of doing ill or contracting guilt is not so much measured by years and days as by the strength of the delinquent's understanding and judgment. (l) But within the age of seven years an infant cannot be punished for any capital offence, whatever circumstances of a mischievous discretion may appear; for ex presumptione juris such an infant cannot have discretion; and against this presumption no averment shall be admitted. (m)

Infants committing capital crimes.

On the attainment of fourteen years of age, the criminal actions of infants are subject to the same modes of construction as those of the rest of society; for the law presumes them at those years to be doli capaces, and able to discern between good and evil, and therefore subjects them to capital punishments as much as if they were of full age. (n) But during the interval between fourteen years and seven, an infant shall be primâ facie deemed to be doli incapax, and presumed to be unacquainted with guilt; yet this presumption will diminish with the advance of the offender's years, and will depend upon the particular facts and circumstances of his case. The evidence of malice, however, which is to supply age, should be strong and clear beyond all doubt and contradiction; but if it appear to the Court and jury that the offender was doli capax, and could discern between good and evil, he may be convicted and suffer death. (o) Thus, it is said that an infant of eight years old may be guilty of murder, and shall be hanged for it: (p) and where an infant between eight and nine years old was indicted, and found guilty of burning two barns, and it appeared, upon examination, that he had

(o) 1 Hale, 25, 27. 4 Blac. Com. 23. The civil law, as to capital punishments, distinguished the ages, into four ranks: 1. Ætas pubertatis plena, which is eighteen years. 2. Ætas pubertatis, or pubertas generally, which is fourteen years, at which time persons were likewise presumed to be doli capaces. 3. Ætas pubertati proxima; but in this the Roman lawyers were divided, some assigning it to ten years and a half, others to eleven; before which the party was not presumed to be doli capax. 4. Infantia, which lasts till seven years, within which age there can be no guilt of a capital offence. 1 Hale, 17 - 19.

An infant of the age of nine years, having killed an infant of the like age, confessed the felony; and, upon examination, it was found that he hid the blood and the body. The justices held that he ought to be hanged; but they respited the execution that he might have a pardon. (r) Another infant, of the age of ten years, who had killed his companion and hid himself was, however, actually hanged; upon the ground that it appeared by his hiding that he could discern between good and evil; and malitia supplet aetatem. (s) And a girl of thirteen was burnt for killing her mistress. (t) Whenever a person under the age of fourteen is charged with committing a felony, the proper course is to leave the case to the jury to say whether, at the time of committing the offence, such person had guilty knowledge that he was doing wrong. (n)

In the case of rape, the law presumes that an infant under the age of fourteen years is unable to commit the crime; and therefore he cannot be guilty of it. (u) So also, for the like reason, such an infant cannot be guilty of an assault with intent to commit a rape, (v) or of carnally knowing a girl under ten years of age. (w) And this presumption cannot be rebutted, and evidence is not admissible to prove that the infant is in fact competent to commit any such offence. (x) But this presumption is upon the ground of impotency rather than the want of discretion; for he may be a principal in the second degree, as aiding and assisting in this offence as well as in other felonies, if it appear by sufficient circumstances that he had a mischievous discretion. years old.

In 1748, W. York, a boy of ten years of age, was convicted for the murder of a girl of about five years of age; but Willes, C. J., out of regard to the tender years of the prisoner, respited execution till he could take the opinion of the rest of the judges, whether it was proper to execute him or not.

The boy and girl were parish children, under the care of a parishioner; and on the day of the murder he and his wife went out to their work, and left the children in bed together. When they returned, the girl was missing; and the boy, being asked what was become of her, answered that he had helped her up and put on her clothes, and she had gone he knew not whither. Upon this, strict search was made for the child. During this search, the man observed that a heap of dung near the house had been newly turned up; and, upon removing the upper part of the heap, he found the body of the child about a foot's depth under the surface, cut and mangled in a most barbarous and horrid manner. Upon this discovery, the boy, who was the only person capable of committing the fact, that was left at home with the child, was charged with the fact, which he stiffly denied. When the coroner's jury met, the boy was again charged, but persisted still to deny the fact. At length, being closely interrogated, he fell to crying, and said he would tell the whole truth. He then said that the child had been used to foul herself in bed; that she did so that morning, (which was not true, for the bed was searched and found to be clean,) that thereupon he took her out of the bed and carried her to the dung-heap, and with a large knife, which he found about the house, cut her in the manner the body appeared to be mangled, and buried her in the dung-heap; placing the dung and straw that was bloody under the body, and covering it up with what was clean; and having so done, he got water and washed himself as clean as he could. The boy was the next morning carried before a neighbouring justice of the peace, before whom he repeated his confession, with all the circumstances he had related to the coroner and his jury. The justice of the peace very prudently deferred proceeding to a commitment, until the boy should have an opportunity of recollecting himself. Accordingly he warned him of the danger he was in if he should be thought guilty of the fact he stood charged with, and admonished him not to wrong himself: and then ordered him into a room where none of the crowd that attended should have access to him. When the boy had been some hours in this room, where victuals and drink were provided for him, he was brought a second time before the justice, and then he repeated his former confession:—upon which he was committed to gaol. On the trial, evidence was given of the declarations before mentioned to have been made before the coroner and his jury, and before the justice of the peace; and of many declarations to the same purpose which the boy made to other people after he came to gaol, and even down to the day of his trial; for he constantly told the same story in substance, commonly adding that the devil put him upon committing the fact. Upon this evidence, with some other circumstances tending to corroborate the confessions, he was convicted. The judges having taken time to consider this report, unanimously agreed; 1. That the declarations stated in the report were evidence proper to be left to the jury. 2. That, supposing the boy to have been guilty of this fact, there were so many circumstances stated in the report which were undoubtedly tokens of what Lord Hale calls a mischievous discretion, that he was certainly a proper subject for capital punishment, and ought to suffer; for it would be of very dangerous consequence to have it thought that children may commit such atrocious crimes with impunity. That there are many crimes of the most heinous nature, such as (in the present case) the murder of young children, poisoning parents or masters, burning houses, &c., which children are very capable of committing; and which they may in some circumstances be under strong temptations to commit; and therefore, though the taking away the life of a boy of ten years old might savour of cruelty, yet, as the example of that boy's punishment might be a means of deterring other children from the like offences, and as the sparing the boy, merely on account of his age, would probably have a quite contrary tendency; in justice to the public, the law ought to take its course; unless there remained any doubt touching his guilt. In this general principle all the judges concurred: but two or three of them, out of great tenderness and caution, advised the chief justice to send another reprieve for the prisoner; suggesting that it might possibly appear, on further inquiry, that the boy had taken this matter upon himself at the instigation of some person or other, who hoped by this artifice to screen the real offender from justice. Accordingly the chief justice granted one or two more reprieves; and desired the justice of the peace who took the boy's examination, and also some other persons, in whose prudence he could confide, to make the strictest inquiry they could into the affair, and report to him. At length he, receiving no further light, determined to send no more reprieves, and to leave the prisoner to the justice of the law at the expiration of the last; but, before the expiration of that reprieve, execution was respited till further order, by warrant from one of the secretaries of state: and at the summer assizes, 1757, the prisoner had the benefit of His Majesty's pardon, upon condition of his entering immediately into the sea service. (z)

How far statutes extend to cases of infancy.

It is said that an act making a new felony does not extend to an infant under the age of discretion, namely, fourteen years old (a) and that general statutes which give corporal punishment are not to extend to infants; and that, therefore, if an infant be convicted in ravishment of ward, he shall not be imprisoned, though the statute of Merton, c. 6, be general in that case. (b) But this must be understood, where the corporal punishment is, as it were, but collateral to the offence, and not the direct intention of the proceeding against the infant for his misdemeanor; in many cases of which kind the infant under the age of twenty-one shall be spared, though possibly the punishment be enacted by Parliament. (c)

[6] But where a fact is made felony or treason, it extends as well to infants, if above fourteen years, as to others. And this appears by several Acts of Parliament, as by 1 Jac. 1, c. 11, (d) of felony for marrying two wives, in which there was a special exception of marriages within the age of consent, which in females is twelve, in males fourteen years; so that if the marriage were above the age of consent, though within the age of twenty-one years, it was not exempted from the penalty. So by the 21 Hen. 8, c. 7, (e) concerning felony by servants that embezzle their masters' goods delivered to them, there was a special provision that it should not extend to servants under the age of eighteen years, who certainly had been within the penalty, if above the age of discretion, namely, fourteen years, though under eighteen years, unless there had been a special provision to exclude them. And so by the 12 Ann. c. 7, (f) (by which it was made felony without benefit of clergy to steal goods to the value of 40s. out of a house, though the house were not broken open), where apprentices who should rob their masters were excepted out of the Act. (f)

In many cases of crimes committed by infants, the judges will in prudence respite the execution in order to get a pardon: and it is said that if an infant apparently wanting discretion be indicted and found guilty of felony, the justices themselves may dismiss him without a pardon. (g) But this authority to dismiss him, must be understood of a reprieve before judgment; or of a case where the jury find the prisoner within the age of seven years, or not of sufficient discretion to judge between good and evil. (h)

Of delaying execution where an infant is convicted.

II. It has been considered, that there are four kinds of persons who may be said to be non compos:—1. An idiot. 2. One made non compos by sickness, 3. A lunatic. 4. One that is drunk. (i) But it should be observed, that every person at the age of discretion is presumed sane, unless the contrary is proved; and if a lunatic has lucid intervals, the law presumes the offence of such person to have been committed in a lucid interval, unless it appears to have been committed in the time of his distemper. (k)

Of persons non compos mentis.

An idiot is a fool or madman from his nativity, and one who never has any lucid intervals: and such an one is described as a person that cannot number twenty, tell the days of the week, does not know his father or mother, his own age, &c.: but these are mentioned as instances only; for whether idiot or not is a question of fact for the jury. (l) One who is surdus et mutus a nativitate is in presumption of law an idiot, and the rather because he has no possibility to understand what is forbidden by law to be done, or under what penalties: but if it appear that he has the use of understanding, which many of that condition discover by signs to a very great measure, then he may be tried, and suffer judgment and execution; though great caution should be used in such a proceeding. Just. 29, a. But if one who is both deaf and dumb, may discover by signs that he hath the use of understanding, much more may one who is only dumb, and consequently such a one may be guilty of felony. It may be observed, that from the humane exertions of many ingenious and able persons, and from the extensive charitable institutions for the instruction of the deaf and dumb, many of those unfortunate people have at the present day a very perfect knowledge of right and wrong. In Steel's case, 1

Leach, 451, a prisoner, who could not hear, and could not be prevailed upon to plead, was found mute by the visitation of God, and then tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be transported. And in Jones's case, 1 Leach, 102, where the prisoner (who was indicted on 12 Ann. c. 7, for stealing in a dwelling-house) on being put to the bar appeared to be deaf and dumb, and the jury found a verdict, 'Mute by the visitation of God;' after which a woman was examined upon her oath, to the fact of her being able to make him understand what others said, which she said she could do by means of signs, such prisoner was arraigned, tried, and convicted of the simple larceny. The proper course in such cases is, 1. To swear a jury to determine whether the prisoner be mute of malice or by the visitation of God. 2. Whether he be able to plead. 3. Whether he be sane or not: on which issue the question is, whether he is of sufficient intellect to comprehend the course of the proceedings on the trial so as to be able to make a proper defence. Non compos
sickness.

A person made non compos mentis by sickness, or, as it has been sometimes expressed, a person afflicted with dementia accidentalis vel adventitia, is excused in criminal cases from such acts as are committed while under the influence of his disorder. (n) Several causes have been assigned for this disorder; such as the distemper of the humours of the body; the violence of a disease, as fever or palsy; or the concussion or hurt of the brain: and, as it is more or less violent, it is distinguishable in kind or degree, from a particular dementia, in respect of some particular matters, to a total alienation of the mind, or complete madness. (o)

Lunatic.

A lunatic is one labouring also under a species of the dementia accidentalis vel adventitia, but distinguishable in this, that he is afflicted by his disorder only at certain periods and vicissitudes; having intervals of reason. Such a person during his frenzy is entitled to the same indulgence as to his acts, and stands in the same degree with one whose disorder is fixed and permanent. (p) The name of lunacy was taken from the influence which the moon was supposed to have in all disorders of the brain; a notion which has been exploded by the sounder philosophy of modern times.

Persons drunk.

With respect to a person non compos mentis from drunkenness, a species of madness which has been termed dementia affectata, it is a settled rule, that if the drunkenness be voluntary, it cannot excuse a man from the commission of any crime, (q) but on the contrary must be considered as an aggravation of whatever he does amiss. (r) Yet if a person, by the unskilfulness of his physician, or by the contrivance of his enemies, eat or drink such a thing as causes frenzy, this puts him in the same condition with any other frenzy, and equally excuses him; also, if by one or more such practices an habitual or fixed frenzy be caused, though this madness was contracted by the vice and will of the party, yet the habitual and fixed frenzy caused thereby puts the man in the same condition as if it were contracted at first involuntarily. (s) And, though voluntary drunkenness cannot excuse from the commission of crime, yet where, as upon a charge of murder, the material question is, whether an act was premeditated or done only with sudden heat and impulse, the fact of the party being intoxicated has been holden to be a circumstance proper to be taken into consideration. son's case, 2 Lewin, 137, where the prisoner being deaf and dumb, but able to read, the indictment was handed to him with the usual questions written upon paper, and he wrote his plea on paper. The jurors' names were then handed to him, with the question, 'whether he objected to any of them?' and he wrote for answer, 'No.' The judge's note of the evidence of each witness was handed to him, and he was asked in writing, if he had any questions to put. In a case of misdemeanor, after a jury had found that the prisoner was mute by the visitation of God, but was of sound mind, his counsel was permitted to plead not guilty for him, and the trial proceeded in the usual manner, and the evidence was not interpreted to the prisoner. Reg. v. Whitfield, 3 C. & K. 121, Williams, J.

Where a prisoner, on being brought up to be arraigned, stands mute or it appears questionable whether he be sane or not, the proper course is to swear a jury to try the question, as it is for them and not for the court to decide whether the prisoner stands mute of malice, or is insane. (t) By Holroyd, J., in Rex v. Grindley, Worcester Sum. Ass. 1819, MS. But in

So in a case of maliciously stabbing, a very learned judge observed, that with regard to the intention, drunkenness might perhaps be adverted to according to the nature of the instrument used. If a man used a stick, a jury would not infer a malicious intent so strongly against him, if drunk, when he made an intemperate use of it, as they would if he had used a different kind of weapon; but where a dangerous instrument was used, which, if used, must produce grievous bodily harm, drunkenness could have no effect on the consideration of the malicious intent of the party. (u) So drunkenness is often very material where the question is as to the intent with which an act was done. On an indictment for inflicting a bodily injury dangerous to life, with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoners were both very drunk at the time, and Patteson, J., told the jury, that ‘although drunkenness is no excuse for any crime whatever, yet it is often of very great importance in cases where it is a question of intention. A person may be so drunk as to be utterly unable to form any intention at all, and yet he may be guilty of very great violence.’ (v) So where a prisoner was indicted for shooting with intent to murder, and he was shown to have been intoxicated shortly before he fired the shot; Coleridge, J., told the jury, that ‘drunkenness is ordinarily neither a defence nor excuse for crime, and where it is available as a partial answer to a charge, it rests on the prisoner to prove it, and it is not enough that he was excited or rendered more irritable, unless the intoxication was such as to prevent his restraining himself from committing the act in question, or to take away from him the power of forming any specific intention.’ (w) And where, on an indictment for attempting to commit suicide, it appeared that the prisoner had thrown herself into a well, and the witness who proved this, stated that at the time she did so, she was so drunk as not to know what she was about; Jervis, C.J., said, ‘If the prisoner was so drunk as not to know what she was about, how can you say that she intended to destroy herself.’ (x) So drunkenness may be taken into consideration in cases where what the law deems sufficient provocation has been given, because the question is, in such cases, whether the fatal act is to be attributed to the passion of anger excited by the previous provocation, and that passion is more easily excitable in a person when in a state of intoxication than when he is sober. (y) So where the question is whether words have been uttered with a deliberate purpose, or are merely low and idle expressions, the drunkenness of the party uttering them is proper to be considered. (z) But if there is really a previous determination to resent a slight affront in a barbarous manner, the state of drunkenness in which the prisoner was, ought not to be regarded; for it would furnish no excuse. (z) So upon an indictment for stabbing, a case of murder by stabbing with a bayonet, where Rex v. Grindley was relied upon, Park, J. J. A., in the presence of Littledale, J., said, ‘highly as I respect that late excellent Judge (Holroyd), I differ from him, and my brother Littledale agrees with me. the jury may take into their consideration, among other circumstances, the fact of the prisoner being drunk at the time, in order to determine whether he acted under a bonâ fide apprehension that his person or property was about to be attacked. (a) So on an indictment for an assault, in considering whether the prisoner apprehended an assault upon himself, the jury may take into consideration the state of drunkenness in which he was. (b)

Idiocy and lunacy are the prevailing distinctions.

But though this subject of non compos mentis may be spun out to a greater length, and branched into several kinds and degrees, yet it appears that the prevailing distinction herein in law is between idiocy and lunacy; the first, a fatuity a nativitate, or dementia naturalis, which excuses the party as to his acts; the other, accidental or adventitious madness, which, whether permanent and fixed, or with lucid intervals, goes under the name of lunacy, and excuses equally with idiocy as to acts done during the frenzy. (c)

The great difficulty in cases of this kind is to determine where a person shall be said to be so far deprived of his senses and memory as not to have any of his actions imputed to him; or where, notwithstanding some defects of this kind, he still appears to have so much reason and understanding as will make him accountable for his actions. Lord Hale, speaking of partial insanity, says, that it is the condition of very many, especially melancholy persons, who for the most part discover their defect in excessive fears and griefs, and yet are not wholly destitute of the use of reason; and that this partial insanity seems not to excuse them in the committing of any capital offence. And he says further, 'Doubtless most persons that are felons of themselves and others are under a degree of partial insanity when they commit these offences: it is very difficult to define the invisible line that divides perfect and partial insanity; but it must rest upon circumstances duly to be weighed and considered both by the judge and jury, lest on the one side there be a kind of inhumanity towards the defects of human nature, or, on the other side, too great an indulgence given to great crimes.' And he concludes by saying, 'the best measure I can think of is this: such a person as, labouring under melancholy distempers, hath yet ordinarily as great understanding as ordinarily a child of fourteen years hath, is such a person as may be guilty of treason or felony.' (d)

Lord Ferrers' case.—Murder.

In the case of Lord Ferrers, who was tried before the House of Lords for murder, it was proved that his lordship was occasionally insane, and incapable from his insanity of knowing what he did, or judging of the consequences of his actions. But the murder was deliberate; and it appeared that when he committed the crime he had capacity sufficient to form a design and know its consequences. It was urged, on the part of the prosecution, that complete possession of reason was unnecessary to warrant the judgment of the law, and that it was sufficient if the party had such possession of reason as enabled him to comprehend the nature of his actions, and discriminate between moral good and evil. And he was found guilty and executed. (e)

In Arnold's case, who was tried for maliciously shooting at Lord Onslow, it appeared clearly that the prisoner was, to a certain extent, deranged, and that he had greatly misconceived the conduct of Lord Onslow; but it also appeared that he had formed a regular design, and prepared the proper means for carrying it into effect. Mr. J. Tracey told the jury, that where a person has committed a great offence, the exemption of insanity must be very clearly made out before it is allowed; that it is not every kind of idle and frantic humour of a man, or something unaccountable in his actions, which will show him to be such a madman as is to be exempted from punishment; but that where a man is totally deprived of his understanding and memory, and does not know what he is doing, any more than an infant, a brute, or a wild beast, he will properly be exempted from justice or the punishment of the law. (f)

Arnold's case.

In Parker's case, who was indicted for aiding the King's enemies, by entering into the French service in time of war between France and this country, the defence was rested upon the ground of insanity; and a witness on his behalf stated, that his general character from a child was that of a person of very weak intellect; so weak that it excited surprise in the neighbourhood when he was accepted for a soldier. But the evidence for the prosecution had shown the act to have been done with considerable deliberation and possession of reason; and that the prisoner, who was a marine, having been captured by the French and carried into the Isle of France, after a confinement of about six weeks, entered voluntarily into the French service, and stated to a captive comrade that it was much more agreeable to be at liberty and have plenty of money than remain confined in a dungeon. The Attorney-General replied to this defence of insanity, that before it could have any weight in rebutting a charge so clearly made out, the jury must be properly satisfied that at the time when the crime was committed the prisoner did not really know right from wrong. And the jury, after hearing the evidence summed up, without hesitation pronounced the prisoner guilty. (g) teristic of insanity occasioned by epilepsy for the patient to imbibe violent antipathies against particular individuals, even his dearest friends, and to have a desire of taking vengeance upon them from causes wholly imaginary, which no persuasion could remove, and that yet the patient might be rational and collected upon every other subject. He had no doubt of the insanity of the prisoner, and said he could not be deceived by assumed appearances. A commission of lunacy was also produced, dated the 17th of June, 1812, and an inquisition taken upon it, whereby the prisoner was found insane, and to have been so from the 30th of March last. (h) Mr. J. Le Blanc told the jury, that it was for them to determine whether the prisoner, when he committed the offence with which he stood charged, was incapable of distinguishing right from wrong, or under the influence of any illusion in respect of the prosecutor which rendered his mind at the moment insensible of the nature of the act he was about to commit: since in that case he would not be legally responsible for his conduct. On the other hand, provided they should be of opinion that when he committed the offence he was capable of distinguishing right from wrong, and not under the influence of such an illusion as disabled him from discerning that he was doing a wrong act, he would be amenable to the justice of his country, and guilty in the eye of the law. The jury, after considerable deliberation, pronounced the prisoner guilty. (i)

case.—Murder.

In Bellingham's case, who was tried for the murder of Mr. Perceval, a part of the prisoner's defence was insanity; and upon this part of the case, Mansfield, C. J., stated to the jury, that in order to support such a defence it ought to be proved by the most distinct and unquestionable evidence that the prisoner was incapable of judging between right and wrong; that in fact it must be proved beyond all doubt, that at the time he committed the atrocious act with which he stood charged, he did not consider that murder was a crime against the laws of God and nature; and that there was no other proof of insanity which would excuse murder, or any other crime. That in the species of madness called lunacy, where persons are subject to temporary paroxysms, in which they are guilty of acts of extravagance, such persons committing crimes when they are not affected by the malady would be, to all intents and purposes, amenable to justice; and that so long as they could distinguish good from evil they would be answerable for their conduct. And that in the species of insanity in which the patient fancies the existence of injury, and seeks an opportunity of gratifying revenge by some hostile act, if such a person be capable in other respects of distinguishing right from wrong, there would be no excuse for any act of atrocity which he might commit under this description of derangement. and particularly the deceased, were continually issuing warrants against him with intent to deprive him of his liberty and life, the great judge who tried the case told the jury that ‘they must be satisfied, before they could acquit the prisoner on the ground of insanity, that he did not know, when he committed the act, what the effect of it, if fatal, would be, with reference to the crime of murder. The question was, did he know that he was committing an offence against the laws of God and nature?’ and his lordship expressed his complete accordance in the observations of C. J. Mansfield in the last case. (l)

On the trial of Oxford, for shooting at the Queen, Lord Denman, C. J., told the jury, ‘Persons primâ facie must be taken to be of sound mind till the contrary is shown. But a person may commit a criminal act, and not be responsible. If some controlling disease was, in truth, the acting power within him which he could not resist, then he will not be responsible. It is not more important than difficult to lay down the rule by which you are to be governed,’ ‘On the part of the defence, it is contended that the prisoner was non compos mentis, that is (as it has been said) unable to distinguish right from wrong, or, in other words, that from the effect of a diseased mind he did not know at the time that the act he did was wrong.’ ‘Something has been said about the power to contract and to make a will; but I think that those things do not supply any test. The question is, whether the prisoner was labouring under that species of insanity which satisfies you that he was quite unaware of the nature, character, and consequences of the act he was committing, or, in other words, whether he was under the influence of a diseased mind, and was really unconscious at the time he was committing the act that it was a crime?’ (m)

J. Hadfield was tried in the Court of King's Bench, in 1800, for high treason, in shooting at the King, in Drury Lane Theatre; and the defence was insanity. He had been a private soldier in a dragoon regiment, and in 1793 received many severe wounds in battle, near Lisle, which had caused partial derangement of mind, and he had been dismissed from the army on account of insanity. Since his return to this country he had been annually out of his mind from the beginning of spring to the end of the dog-days, and had been under confinement as a lunatic. When affected by his disorder, he imagined himself to hold intercourse with God; sometimes called himself God, or Jesus Christ, and used other expressions of the most irreligious and blasphemous kind; and also committed acts of the greatest extravagance; but at other times he appeared to be rational, and discovered no symptom of mental incapacity or disorder. On the 11th of May preceding his commission of the act in question his mind was very much disordered, and he used many blasphemous expressions. At one or two o'clock on the following morning, he suddenly jumped out of bed, and alluding to his child, a boy of eight months old, of whom he was usually remarkably fond, said he was about to dash his brains out against the bed-post, and that God had ordered him to do so; and upon his wife screaming, and his friends coming in, he ran into a cupboard and declared he would lie there, it should be his bed, and God had said so; and when doing this, having overset some water, he said he had lost a great deal of blood. On the same and the following day he used many incoherent and blasphemous expressions. On the morning of the 15th of May he seemed worse, said that he had seen God in the night, that the coach was waiting, and that he had been to dine with the King. He spoke very highly of the King, the royal family, and particularly of the Duke of York. He then went to his master's workshop, whence he returned to dinner at two, but said that he stood in no need of meat, and could live without it. He asked for tea between three and four o'clock, and talked of being made a member of the society of odd fellows; and, after repeating his irreligious expressions, went out and repaired to the theatre. On the part of the Crown, it was proved that he had sat in his place in the theatre nearly three quarters of an hour before the King entered; that at the moment when the audience rose, on His Majesty's entering his box, he got up above the rest, and presenting a pistol loaded with slugs, fired it at the King's person, and then let it drop; and when he fired his situation appeared favourable for taking aim, for he was standing upon the second seat from the orchestra in the pit; and he took a deliberate aim, by looking down the barrel, as a man usually does when taking aim. On his apprehension, amongst other expressions, he said that 'he knew perfectly well his life was forfeited; that he was tired of life, and regretted nothing but the fate of a woman who was his wife, and would be his wife a few days longer, he supposed.' These words he spoke calmly, and without any apparent derangement; and with equal calmness repeated that he was tired of life, and said that 'his plan was to get rid of it by other means; he did not intend anything against the life of the King; he knew the attempt only would answer his purpose.' The counsel for the prisoner (n) in his very able address to the jury, put the case as one of a species of insanity in the nature of a morbid delusion of the intellect, and admitted that it was necessary for them to be satisfied that the act in question was the immediate unqualified offspring of the disease. And Lord Kenyon held that as the prisoner was deranged immediately before the offence was committed, it was improbable that he had recovered his senses in the interim; and although, were they to run into nicety, proof might be demanded of his insanity at the precise moment when the act was committed; yet, there being no reason for believing him to have been at that period a rational and accountable being, he ought to be acquitted. (o)

On an indictment for the murder of Mr. Drummond the defence was insanity, and the medical evidence was that persons of otherwise sound mind might be affected with morbid delusions; that the prisoner was in that condition; that a person labouring under a morbid delusion might have a moral perception of right and wrong; but that, in the case of the prisoner, it was a delusion which carried him away beyond the power of his own control, and left him no such perception; and that he was not capable of exercising any control over acts which had a connection with his delusion; that it was the nature of his disease to go on gradually until it had reached a climax, when it burst forth with irresistible intensity; that a man might go on for years quietly, though at the same time under its influence, but would at once break out into the most extravagant and violent paroxysms. Tindal, C. J., told the jury, ‘The question to be determined is, whether, at the time the act in question was committed, the prisoner had or had not the use of his understanding so as to know that he was doing a wrong or wicked act. If the jury should be of opinion that the prisoner was not sensible at the time he committed the act that he was violating both the laws of God and man, (p) then he would be entitled to a verdict in his favour; but if, on the contrary, they were of opinion that, when he committed the act, he was in a sound state of mind, (q) then their verdict must be against him.’ (r)

The acquittal in the preceding case, on the ground of insanity, gave rise to a discussion in the House of Lords, and the following questions were put to the judges, and answered by them all, except Mr. Justice Maule, as follows, in June 1843:—

Questions of the Lords, and answers of the judges.

Q. I. ‘What is the law respecting alleged crimes committed by persons afflicted with insane delusion in respect of one or more particular subjects or persons; as, for instance, where, at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, the accused knew he was acting contrary to law, but did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some supposed public benefit?’

A. I. ‘Assuming that your lordships’ enquiries are confined to those persons who labour under such partial delusions only, and are not in other respects insane, we are of opinion that notwithstanding the accused did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some public benefit, he is nevertheless punishable, according to the nature of the crime committed, if he knew at the time of committing such crime that he was acting contrary to law, by which expression we understand your lordships to mean the law of the land.’

Q. II. ‘What are the proper questions to be submitted to the jury where a person alleged to be afflicted with insane delusion respecting one or more particular subjects or persons, is charged with the commission of a crime (murder, for example,) and insanity is set up as a defence?’

Q. III. ‘In what terms ought the question to be left to the jury as to the prisoner’s state of mind, at the time when the act was committed?’

(p) Quare, whether this position was not too favourable for the prisoner, as it required the jury to be satisfied that the prisoner was aware both of the laws of God and man?

(q) Quare, this position also, as a man may not have a perfectly sound mind, and yet be criminally responsible?

(r) Reg. v. M’Naghten, 10 Cl. & F. 200.

A. II. and III. ‘As these two questions appear to us to be more conveniently answered together, we submit our opinion to be that the jury ought to be told in all cases that every man is to be presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction; and that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity it must be clearly proved that, at the time of committing the act, the accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong. The mode of putting the latter part of the question to the jury on these occasions has generally been, whether the accused at the time of doing the act knew the difference between right and wrong; which mode, though rarely, if ever, leading to any mistake with the jury, is not, as we conceive, so accurate when put generally and in the abstract, as when put with reference to the party’s knowledge of right and wrong, in respect to the very act with which he is charged. If the question were to be put as to the knowledge of the accused solely and exclusively with reference to the law of the land, it might tend to confound the jury, by inducing them to believe that an actual knowledge of the law of the land was essential in order to lead to a conviction: whereas, the law is administered upon the principle that every one must be taken conclusively to know it, without proof that he does know it. If the accused was conscious that the act was one that he ought not to do, and if that act was at the same time contrary to the law of the land, he is punishable; and the usual course, therefore, has been to leave the question to the jury, whether the accused had a sufficient degree of reason to know that he was doing an act that was wrong; and this course we think is correct, accompanied with such observations and explanations as the circumstances of each particular case may require.’

Q. IV. ‘If a person under an insane delusion as to existing facts commits an offence in consequence thereof, is he thereby excused?’

A. IV. ‘The answer must, of course, depend on the nature of the delusion; but making the same assumption as we did before, namely, that he labours under such partial delusion only, and is not in other respects insane, we think he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real. For example, if, under the influence of his delusion, he supposes another man to be in the act of attempting to take away his life, and he kills that man, as he supposes, in self-defence, he would be exempt from punishment. If his delusion was that the deceased had inflicted a serious injury to his character and fortune, and he killed him in revenge for such supposed injury, he would be liable to punishment?’

Q. V. ‘Can a medical man, conversant with the disease of insanity, who never saw the prisoner previously to the trial, but who was present during the whole trial, and the examination of the witnesses, be asked his opinion as to the state of the prisoner’s mind at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, or his opinion whether the prisoner was conscious at the time of doing the act that he was acting contrary to law, or whether he was labouring under any, and what, delusion at the time?

A. V. We think the medical man, under the circumstances supposed, cannot, in strictness, be asked his opinion in the terms above stated, because each of those questions involves the determination of the truth of the facts deposed to, which it is for the jury to decide, and the questions are not questions upon a mere matter of science, in which case such evidence is admissible. But where the facts are admitted, or not disputed, and the question becomes substantially one of science only, it may be convenient to allow the question to be put in that general form, though the same cannot be insisted on as a matter of right.^(s)

Insanity must be as to the particular act in question.

(s) 1 C. & K., 130., 10 C. & F. 200. Maule, J., after expressing the difficulty he felt in answering the questions, because they did not arise out of, and were not put with reference to, a particular case, or for a particular purpose, which might limit or explain the generality of their terms, said, in answer to the first question, 'so far as it comprehends the question whether a person circumstanced as stated in the question is for that reason only to be found not guilty of a crime respecting which the question of his guilt has been duly raised in a criminal proceeding, and I am of opinion that he is not. There is no law that I am aware of that makes persons in the state described in the question not responsible for their criminal acts. To render a person irresponsible for crime on account of unsoundness of mind the unsoundness should, according to the law as it has been long understood and held, be such as to render him incapable of knowing right from wrong. The terms used in the question cannot be said (with reference only to the usage of language) to be equivalent to a description of this kind and degree of unsoundness of mind.' To the second question the learned judge answered, 'If, on a trial such as is suggested in the question, the judge should have occasion to state what kind and degree of insanity would amount to a defence, it should be stated conformably to what I have mentioned in my answer to the first question as being, in my opinion, the law on this subject.' To the third question the learned judge replied, 'There are no terms, which the judge is by law required to use. They should not be inconsistent with the law as above stated, but should be such as, in the discretion of the judge, are proper to assist the jury in coming to a right conclusion as to the guilt of the accused.' To the fourth question the learned judge replied that the answer to the first question was applicable to this. To the fifth question the learned judge replied, 'whether a question can be asked depends, not merely on the questions of fact raised on the record, but on the course of the cause at the time when it is proposed to ask it; and the state of an inquiry as to the guilt of a person charged with a crime, and defended on the ground of insanity, may be such that such a question as either of those suggested is proper to be asked and answered, though the witness has never seen the person before the trial, and though he has been present and heard the witnesses; these circumstances of his never having seen the person before, and of his having been present at the trial, not being necessarily sufficient, as it seems to me, to exclude the lawfulness of a question, which is otherwise lawful, though I will not say that an enquiry might not be in such a state as that these circumstances should have such an effect. Supposing there is nothing else in the state of the trial to make the questions suggested proper to be asked and answered, except that the witness had been present and heard the evidence, it is to be considered whether that is enough to sustain the question; in principle it is open to the objection that as the opinion of the witness is founded on those conclusions of fact, which he forms from the evidence, and as it does not appear what these conclusions are, it may be that the evidence he gives is on such an assumption of facts as makes it irrelevant to the enquiry. But such questions have been very frequently asked, and the evidence to which they are directed given, and has never, that I am aware of, been successfully objected to; and I think the course and practice of receiving such evidence, confirmed by the very high authority of Tindal, C. J., Williams, J., and Coleridge, J., in Reg. v. M'Naghten, who not only received it, but left it, as I understand, to the jury without any remark derogating from its weight, ought to be held to warrant its reception, notwithstanding the objection in principle to which it may be open.'

entor, who had purchased her, and taken another cow out of it. Owing to the loss of his cow, and various other losses, the prisoner's mind was affected, and he was under the impression that every one was robbing him. Tindal, C. J., told the jury that, it is not mere eccentricity or singularity of manner that will suffice to establish the plea of insanity; it must be shown that the prisoner had no competent use of his understanding, so as to know that he was doing a wrong thing in the particular act in question.' (t)

Upon an indictment for murder, by burying a child alive, upon the surgeon, who was called for the prosecution, being asked whether a fracture of the skull was the cause of the death, or whether the child had, after the fracture of the skull, been suffocated by being buried while alive, the prisoner said, in open court, 'I put him in alive.' Two witnesses stated that the prisoner was of 'very weak intellect,' and the surgeon of the prison stated that the prisoner was of 'very weak intellect, but capable of knowing right from wrong.' Maule, J., after adverting to the evidence adduced, said to the jury, 'If you are satisfied that the prisoner committed this offence, but you are also satisfied that, at the time of the committing the offence, the prisoner was so insane that he did not know right from wrong, he should be acquitted on that ground; but if you think that, at the time of committing the offence, he did know right from wrong, he is responsible for his acts, although he is of weak intellect.' (u)

Where the defence of insanity is set up, it must be proved affirmatively that the prisoner is insane, in order to warrant the jury in acquitting on that ground: and if the fact be left in doubt and the crime charged proved, it is their duty to convict.

Upon an indictment for murder it appeared that the prisoner, in the soldier's room in the barracks, took up his musket as if to clean it, levelled it at the deceased, fired and killed her on the spot; her husband and child being in the room, and two other soldiers being present. The prisoner was a man of singular habits, and seldom spoke to the other soldiers, was very 'secluded, sulky, and sullen,' and was described as 'a close-minded man,' and 'a man of a very nasty temper.' He had frequently complained of illness, and had made efforts to get into the hospital, but he was rejected, as having no visible disorder. (The report contains a statement of sundry other facts as to the prisoner's state of mind.) The defence was that the prisoner was insane, or that he was under such an insane impulse as to render him irresponsible. Rolfe B., in summing up said—'If a prisoner seeks to excuse himself upon the plea of insanity, it is for him to make it clear that he was insane at the time of committing the offence charged. The onus rests on him; and the jury must be satisfied that he actually was insane. If the matter be left in doubt, it will be their duty to convict him; for every man must be presumed to be responsible for his acts till the contrary is clearly shown. A case occurred some time ago at the Central Criminal Court, before Alderson, B., and the jury hesitated as to their verdict, on the ground that they were not satisfied whether the prisoner was or was not of sound mind when he committed the crime; and that learned judge told them, that, unless they were satisfied of his insanity, it would be their duty to find a verdiet of guilty. Every man is held responsible for his acts by the law of this country, if he can discern right from wrong. This subject was a few years ago carefully considered by all the judges, and the law is clear upon the subject. It is true, that learned speculators, in their writings, have laid it down that men, with a consciousness that they were doing wrong, were irresistibly compelled to commit some unlawful act. But who enabled them to dive into the human heart, and see the real motive that prompted the commission of such deeds? It has been urged that no motive has been shown for the commission of this crime. It is true that there is no motive apparently, but a very inadequate one; but it is dangerous ground to take, to say that a man must be insane because men fail to discern the motive for his act. It has also been said that the conduct of the prisoner was that of a madman in committing the offence at such a time, in the presence of the woman's husband, who had arms within his reach; but it would be a most dangerous doctrine to lay down, that because a man committed a desperate offence, with the chance of instant death, and the certainty of future punishment before him, he was therefore insane, as if the perpetration of crimes was to be excused by their very atrocity.' (v)

On the trial of a prisoner for the murder of his wife, it appeared that he had always treated her and their children with kindness; that they were talking with a neighbour at their door late at night, and at four o'clock next morning it was discovered that he had cut the throats of his wife and child, and had attempted to commit suicide. When questioned, he exhibited no sorrow or remorse for his conduct, but stated that 'trouble and dread of poverty and destitution had made him do it, fearing that his wife and child would starve when he was dead.' He said he had contemplated suicide for a week past; he had not had any quarrel with his wife, and that, having got out of bed to destroy himself, the thought had first come into his head to kill his wife and child; he had first attacked her whilst she was asleep in bed; she got away from him, and rushed to the window; he then killed the child, and seizing his wife, pulled her backwards to him, and cut her throat; he next tried to cut his own throat, but his powers failed him, and he did not succeed, though he wounded himself severely. This narrative, coupled with a knowledge of the prisoner's private circumstances, induced the surgeon to form the opinion that the prisoner, at the time he committed the act, had not, in consequence of an uncontrollable impulse, to which all human beings are subject, any control over his conduct. The desire to inflict pain and injury on those previously dear to the prisoner, was in itself a strong symptom of insanity, and the impossibility of resisting a sudden impulse to slay a fellow-being, was another indication that the mind was insane. There was not necessarily a connection between homicidal and suicidal monomania, though it would be more likely that a monomaniac who had contemplated suicide should kill another person, than for one who had not entertained any such feelings of hostility to his own existence. Monomania was an affection, which, for the instant,

An uncontrollable impulse to commit an offence, where there is no real delusion as to any fact, affords no defence.

completely deprived the patient of all self-control in respect of some one particular subject which is the object of the disease. The prisoner had no delusion, and his reasoning faculties did not seem to be affected; but he had a decided monomania evincing itself in the notion that he was coming to destitution. For that, there was some foundation in fact; but it was the surgeon's decided opinion that the prisoner was in an unsound state of mind at the moment he cut his wife's throat. On the day before the prisoner had had his razor sharpened, saying he wanted it to give to some friend; and the prisoner had suffered a severe pecuniary loss not long before, and it had produced a decided effect upon his mind, giving rise to the most gloomy anticipations on account of his wife and family. Parke, B., told the jury that the only question was whether, at the time the prisoner inflicted the wound on his wife, 'he was in a state of mind to be made responsible to the law for her murder. That would depend upon the question, whether he, at the time, knew the nature and character of the deed he was committing, and, if so, whether he knew he was doing wrong in so acting. This mode of dealing with the defence of insanity had not, he was aware, the concurrence of medical men; but he must, nevertheless, express his decided concurrence with B. Rolfe's views of such cases, that learned judge having expressed his opinion that the excuse of an irresistible impulse co-existing with the full possession of reasoning powers might be urged in justification of every crime known to the law—for every man might be said, and truly, not to commit any crime except under the influence of some irresistible impulse. Something more than this was necessary to justify an acquittal on the ground of insanity, and it would therefore be for the jury to say whether, taking into consideration all that the surgeon had said, which was entitled to great weight, the impulse, under which the prisoner had committed this deed, was one which altogether deprived him of the knowledge that he was doing wrong. Could he distinguish between right and wrong? Reliance was placed on the desire to commit suicide, but that did not always evidence insanity. And here the prisoner was led to attempt his own life by the pressure of a real substantial fact clearly apparent to his perceptive organs, and not by any unsubstantial delusion. The fact, however, must be taken into the account, for it might have had a serious effect on the mind of the prisoner, as also the absence of any attempt to escape from justice, and the want of all sense of sorrow and regret immediately after the death of his wife, contrasted with his more natural state of mind afterwards, when he felt and expressed regret and sorrow for his act. These circumstances ought all to be taken into consideration; but it was difficult to see how they could establish the plea of insanity in a case where there was a total absence of all delusion.' (w)

An apparent absence of motive is no ground for inferring an irresistible and insane impulse.

On an indictment for murder, the prisoner appeared to have been on the most intimate terms with the 'unfortunate woman' he had killed. No motive was assigned for the murder. The prisoner having seduced a young woman under a promise of marriage, which he had been unable to fulfil, his reason had been much affected by it. Bramwell, B., read the opinion of the judges in the House of Lords to the jury, and then said, 'It has been urged that you should acquit the prisoner on the ground that, it being impossible to assign any motive for the perpetration of the offence, he must have been acting under what is called a powerful and irresistible influence, or homicidal tendency. But the circumstance of an act being apparently motiveless, is not a ground from which you can safely infer the existence of such an influence. Motives exist unknown and innumerable, which might prompt the act. A morbid and restless, but resistible, thirst for blood, would itself be a motive urging to such a deed for its own relief. But if an influence be so powerful as to be termed irresistible, so much the more reason is there why we should not withdraw any of the safeguards tending to counteract it. There are three powerful restraints existing, all tending to the assistance of the person who is suffering under such an influence—the restraint of religion, the restraint of conscience, and the restraint of law. But if the influence itself be held a legal excuse, rendering the crime dispunishable, you at once withdraw a most powerful restraint—that forbidding and punishing its perpetration. We must return, therefore, to the simple question you have to determine—did the prisoner know the nature of the act he was doing, and did he know that he was doing what was wrong.' (x)

On a trial for murder, it appeared that the prisoner and his wife were walking along a road, and he had been for some time chiding her, and then he fired a pistol at her and she fell; and he pulled her up, and they proceeded a few yards, when he pushed her down, and inflicted a second wound on her throat with a knife. He then got over a hedge into a field, and ran some distance, until he was overtaken by a person who had seen the woman fall. The prisoner wiped the blood off his hands, saying he had met with a misfortune and cut his finger. He would not tell what he had done with the pistol and knife, but said, 'I did it. I intended to do it, and that will put an end to it. I have been unhappy since Christmas.' At the time he shot and cut his wife, he must have known that persons were within a short distance, having just before met them. The prisoner had threatened to murder his wife before, and on the day before he was heard sharpening a knife, and the wife was afterwards seen running out of the house, followed by the prisoner with a knife similar to one found near the place where the murder was committed. The prisoner had been in gaol for debt for two months in the early part of the year, and had been unfortunate in building speculations. Several witnesses were called for the prisoner, who stated that they believed that the prisoner was not in his right mind, and proved sundry statements made by him as to his property and other matters, which were alleged to be delusions, and that his conduct had been strange, and his manner greatly excited. For the prosecution, witnesses were called to prove that he was sane, and had acted in matters of business in a rational manner. Rolfe, B., told the jury that 'insanity was the most difficult

The question is whether the prisoner was so far incapable of knowing right from wrong as to be unable to appreciate the nature of the act he was committing.

question which could engage the attention of any tribunal. It was difficult to define it in words, or even in idea. The opinion of the judges was taken by the House of Lords a few years back, as to what was to constitute a definition of insanity, and it created very great difficulty, but after great and anxious deliberation, they came to the conclusion that the old description was the best, viz. that insanity should constitute a defence only when a party was in such a state of mind arising from disease as to be incapable of deciding between right and wrong; but that this definition was imperfect, as all definitions must be, and would require to be modified with reference to each particular case. Applying that law to the present case, what the jury had to consider was, whether the evidence was such as to satisfy them that at the time the act was committed by the prisoner, he was incapable of understanding right from wrong, as that he could not appreciate the nature of the act he was committing. Perhaps it would be going too far to say that a party was responsible in every case where he had a glimmering knowledge of what was right and wrong. In cases of this description, there was one cardinal rule which should never be departed from, viz. the burden of proving innocence rested on the accused. Every man committing an outrage on the person or property of another, must be, in the first instance, taken to be a responsible being. Such a presumption was necessary for the security of mankind. A man going about the world, marrying, dealing, and acting as if he were sane, must be presumed to be sane till he proves the contrary. The question, therefore, would be, not whether the prisoner was of sound mind, but whether he had made out to their satisfaction that he was not of sound mind. They might arrive at the conclusion, from the nature of his conduct and acts up to the time of the act in question, or shortly preceding it, that he was insane; though he was not capable of proving it by positive testimony, as such was the nature of the mind, that it might be one minute sane and the next insane, and therefore it might be impossible for a party to give positive evidence of its condition at the particular moment in question. . . . The conclusion seemed irresistible, that the prisoner was to some extent labouring under a delusion, but he was not exempt from responsibility because he was labouring under a delusion as to his property, unless that had the effect of making him incapable of understanding the wickedness of murdering his wife. But when that was the question they had to consider, he could not say that it was altogether immaterial that he was insane on one point only. (y) Indeed his insanity on that point might guide them to a conclusion as to his sanity on the point involved in this case, and, in this view of the matter, there were two circumstances in the evidence of great importance: these were, the want of motive for the commission of the crime, and its being committed under circumstances which rendered detection inevitable. They could come to no other conclusion than that the prisoner had taken away the life of his wife, and that this was murder, unless he had satisfied them that he was not capable at the time of appreciating his acts. Summer, 1849. Reg. v. Law, 2 F. & F. 636, S. P.

On a trial for murder the prisoner was acquitted, but a question was reserved as to whether the evidence of a medical man was properly admitted. He volunteered his evidence, and wished to give his opinion upon the evidence as to the state of the prisoner's mind at the time the act was done; and he was allowed so to do. The judges did not come to any formal resolution; but they all thought that in such a case a witness of medical skill might be asked, whether in his judgment such and such appearances were symptoms of insanity, and whether a long fast, followed by a draught of strong liquor, was likely to produce a paroxysm of the disorder in a person subject to it? and that by such questions the effect of his testimony might be got in an unexceptionable manner. Several of the judges doubted whether the witness could be asked on the very point which the jury were to decide; viz., whether, from the testimony given in the case, the act with which the prisoner was charged was, in his opinion, an act of insanity? (a). In a case of maliciously wounding, where it was proposed to call a physician who had heard the whole evidence, to give his opinion as to the insanity of the prisoner, Park J. J. A., after referring to the preceding case, allowed the physician to be asked whether the facts and appearances proved showed symptoms of insanity. (b)

Where the defence to an indictment for murder was that the prisoner was insane at the time he committed the act, and witnesses were called to prove that insanity had existed in many members of the prisoner's family and that he had been insane for three years, a physician, who had been in court during the whole trial, was asked by the counsel for the prosecution 'whether, from all the evidence he had heard, both for the prosecution and defence, he was of opinion that the prisoner, at the time he did the act, was of unsound mind?' and the opinion of the judges in answer to the fifth question (c) was cited in support of the question; Alderson B. and Cresswell, J., held that the question ought not to be put. The proper mode is to ask what are the symptoms of insanity, or to take particular facts, and assuming them to be true, to ask whether they indicate insanity. To take the course suggested is really to substitute the witness for the jury, and allow him to decide upon the whole case. The jury have the facts before them, and they alone must interpret them by the general opinions of scientific men. (d)

So on the trial of an ejectment where the question turned on the sanity of the testator, and a physician was asked whether in his opinion, from the facts proved in evidence, the testator was sane or insane; Lord Campbell, C. J., said the witness might give general scientific evidence on the causes and symptoms of insanity, but he must not express an opinion as to the result of the evidence he had heard with reference to the sanity or insanity of the testator; his lordship saying peremptorily that he would not allow a physician to be substituted for a jury. (e)

Where the defence of insanity has been set up it has been the common practice to prove that other members of the prisoner's family have been afflicted with insanity; but it is a matter of fact that insanity is often hereditary in a family, and therefore that fact should be proved, in the first instance, by the testimony of medical men, and then the inquiry whether another member of the prisoner's family has been insane will be legitimate (f).

A book on the subject of insanity cannot be cited to the jury.

Where, in support of a defence of insanity the prisoner's counsel attempted to quote from 'Cooper's Surgery,' the author's opinions on the subject, in his address to the jury, on the ground that they were the sentiments of one who had studied the subject, and submitted that it was admissible in the same way as opinions of scientific men on matters appertaining to foreign law; Alderson, B., said: 'I should not allow you to read a work on foreign law. Any person who was properly conversant with it might be examined; but then he adds his own personal knowledge and experience to the information he may have obtained from books. We must have the evidence of individuals, not their written opinions. You surely cannot contend that you may give the book in evidence, and if not, what right have you to quote from it in your address, and do that indirectly which you would not be permitted to do in the ordinary course?' And on its being said that it was certainly done in McNaghten's case, Alderson, B., added, 'And that shows still more strongly the necessity for a stringent adherence to the rules laid down for our observance. But for the non-interposition of the judge in that case, you would not probably have thought it necessary to make this struggle now.' (g)

Application of the rules and principles of the foregoing cases.

The application of the rules and principles laid down in these cases to each particular case as it may arise, will necessarily in many instances be attended with difficulty; more especially with regard to the true interpretation of the expressions, which state that the prisoner, in order to be a proper subject of exemption from punishment on the ground of insanity, should appear to have been unable 'to distinguish right from wrong,' or to discern 'that he was doing a wrong act,' or should appear to have been 'totally deprived of his understanding and memory;' as even in Hadfield's case his expressions when apprehended, that 'he was tired of life,' that 'he wanted to get rid of it,' and that 'he did not intend anything against the life of the King, but knew that the attempt only would answer his purpose;' seem to show that he must have been aware that he was doing a wrong act, though the degree of its criminality might have been but imperfectly presented to him, through the morbid delusion by which his senses and understanding were affected. But it is clear that idle and frantic humours, actions occasionally unaccountable and extraordinary, mere dejection of spirits, or even such insanity as will sustain a commission of lunacy, will not be sufficient to exempt a person from punishment who has committed a criminal act. And it seems that though if there be a total permanent want of reason, or if there be a total temporary want of it when the offence was committed, the prisoner will be entitled to an acquittal; yet, if there be a partial degree of reason, a competent use of it, sufficient to have restrained those passions which produced the crime; if there be thought and design, a faculty to distinguish the nature of actions, to discern the difference between moral good and evil; then, upon the fact of the offence proved, the judgment of the law must take place. (h)

In Alison's Principles of the Criminal Law of Scotland, (i) and there is no difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland with reference to insanity, it is said, that 'to amount to a complete bar of punishment, either at the time of committing the offence, or of the trial, the insanity must have been of such a kind as entirely to deprive the prisoner of the use of reason, as applied to the act in question, and the knowledge that he was doing wrong in committing it. If, though somewhat deranged, he is able to distinguish right from wrong, in his own case, and to know that he was doing wrong in the act which he committed, he is liable to the full punishment of his criminal acts.' (k)

If a man in his sound memory commits a capital offence, and before arraignment for it he becomes mad, he ought not to be arraigned for it, because he is not able to plead to it with that advice and caution that he ought. And if, after he has pleaded, the prisoner become mad, he shall not be tried, as he cannot make his defence. If, after he is tried and found guilty, he loses his senses before judgment, judgment shall not be pronounced; and if after judgment he becomes of nonsane memory, execution shall be stayed; for, peradventure, says the humanity of the English law, had the prisoner been of sound memory, he might have alleged something in stay of judgment or execution. he was so or not, Williams, J., held that the counsel for the prosecution should call his witnesses to show that the prisoner was sane, and capable of pleading; as this was not so much an issue joined as a preliminary inquiry for the information of the Court.^(r) But in a similar case Cresswell, J., held, notwithstanding the preceding case, that, as the presumption is that a man is sane, if the prisoner's counsel suggested that he was insane, he must give evidence of the fact.^(s)

[15] But in case a person in a phrenzy happen, by some oversight, or by means of the gaoler, to plead to his indictment, and is put upon his trial, and it appears to the Court upon his trial that he is mad, the judge in his discretion may discharge the jury of him and remit him to gaol to be tried after the recovery of his understanding, especially in case any doubt appear upon the evidence touching his guilt, and this in favorem vitæ; and if there be no colour of evidence to prove him guilty, or if there be pregnant evidence to prove his insanity at the time of the fact committed, then upon the same favour of life and liberty it is fit that the trial proceed in order to his acquittal.^(t) person; and if the jury so impanelled shall find such person to be insane, it shall be lawful for such Court to order such person to be kept in strict custody, in such place and in such manner as to such Court shall seem fit, until his Majesty's pleasure shall be known.'

This section extends to all offences, and is not confined like the first to cases of treason, murder, and felony. The prisoner was indicted for assaulting one E. Earl, and beating her with intent to murder her. The jury found specially that he was insane at the time of committing the offence, and also at the time of the trial, and that they acquitted him on account of such insanity, and the judge ordered him to be kept in custody accordingly. The judges were unanimously of opinion that the second section applies to all cases, though only misdemeanors,—and that though mere insanity at the time of the offence would not have warranted an order, yet insanity found at the time of the trial did warrant it. (w)

And now the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, s. 3, enacts, that 'in all cases where it shall be given in evidence upon the trial of any person charged with any misdemeanor that such person was insane at the time of the commission of such offence, and such person shall be acquitted, the jury shall be required to find specially whether such person was insane at the time of the commission of such offence, and to declare whether such person was acquitted by them on account of such insanity; and if they shall find that such person was insane at the time of the committing of such offence, the Court before whom such trial shall be had shall order such person to be kept in strict custody, in such place and in such manner as to the Court shall seem fit, until Her Majesty's pleasure shall be known; and it shall thereupon be lawful for Her Majesty to give such order for the safe custody of such person, during Her pleasure, in such place and in such manner as to Her Majesty shall seem fit; and in all cases where any person before the passing of this Act has been acquitted of any such offence on the ground of insanity at the time of the commission thereof, and has been detained in custody as a dangerous person, by order of the Court before whom such person has been tried, and still remains in custody, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty to give the like order for the safe custody of such person during her pleasure, as Her Majesty is hereby enabled to give in the case of any person who shall hereafter be acquitted on the ground of insanity.'

Insane persons

Where a prisoner, indicted for a misdemeanor in uttering seditious words, upon his arraignment showed symptoms of insanity, and an inquest was forthwith taken under the statute, it was held that the jury might form their judgment of the state of the mind of the prisoner from his demeanor while the inquest was being taken, and might thereupon find him to be insane without any evidence being given as to his present state. And that it was unnecessary to ask him whether he would cross-examine the witnesses or offer any remarks or evidence, as that would be a useless prolongation of a painful proceeding. (x) So the jury may take

Where a prisoner's counsel set up the defence of insanity for him, and the prisoner objected to that defence, asserting that he was not insane, he was allowed to suggest questions to be put to the witnesses for the prosecution, to negative the supposition that he was insane; and the judge, at the request of the prisoner, allowed additional witnesses to be called on his behalf for the same purpose. (z)

Unless the facts necessary to constitute the crime charged be proved, the case is not within the Act.

If the jury are of opinion that the prisoner did not in fact do all that the law requires to constitute the offence charged, supposing the prisoner had been sane, they must find him not guilty generally, and the Court have no power to order his detention under this Act, although the jury should find that he was in fact insane. Where, therefore, on an indictment for treason, which stated, as an overt act, that the prisoner discharged a pistol loaded with powder and a bullet, the jury found that the prisoner was insane at the time when he discharged the pistol, but whether the pistol was loaded with ball or not there was not satisfactory evidence, the Court expressed a strong opinion that the case was not within the statute. (a)

Grand jury must find the bill.

If the acts proved to have been done by the prisoner be such as would have amounted to the crime charged, if they had been done by a person of sane mind, the grand jury are bound to find a bill, in order that the prisoner may be confined under this Act. (b)

If a prisoner have not at the time of the trial, from the defect of his faculties, sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of the proceedings against him, the jury ought to find that he is not sane, and upon such finding he may be ordered to be kept in custody under this Act. (c)

Subjection to the power of others.

III. Persons are properly excused from those acts which are not done of their own free will, but in subjection to the power of others. (d) Thus, though a legislator establish iniquity by a law, and command the subject to do an act contrary to religion and sound morality; yet obedience to such laws, while in being, is a sufficient extenuation of civil guilt before the municipal tribunal; though a different decree will be pronounced in foro conscientie. (e) And actual force upon the person and present fear of death may, in some cases, excuse a criminal act. Thus, although the fear of having houses burnt or goods spoiled is no excuse in law for joining and marching with rebels, yet an actual force upon the person and present fear of death may form such excuse, provided they continue all the time during which the party remains with the rebels. (f) And in general the person committing a crime will not be answerable if he was not a free agent, and was subject to actual force at the time the act was done. Thus, if A. by force take the arm of B., in which is a weapon, and therewith kill C., A. is guilty of murder, but not B.: but if it be only a moral force put upon B., as by threatening him with duress or imprisonment, or even by an assault to the peril of his life, in order to compel him to kill C., it is no legal excuse. (g) An idiot or lunatic, or a child so young as not to be punishable for his criminal act, when made use of for the purpose of committing crimes, are merely the instruments of the procurer, who will be answerable as a principal. (h) As to persons in private relations, the principal case where constraint of a superior is allowed as an excuse for criminal misconduct proceeds upon the matrimonial subjection of the wife to her husband; for neither a child nor a servant are excused the commission of any crime, whether capital or not capital, by the command or coercion of the parent or master. But a feme covert is so much favoured in respect of that power and authority which her husband has over her, that she shall not suffer any punishment for committing a bare theft, or even a burglary, by the coercion of her husband, or in his company, which the law construes a coercion. (k) But this is only the presumption of law; so that if upon the evidence it clearly appear that the wife was not drawn to the offence by her husband, but that she was the principal inciter of it, she is guilty as well as the husband. And if she be any way guilty of procuring her husband to commit the offence, it seems to make her an accessory before the fact in the same manner as if she had been sole. (l) And if she commit a theft of her own voluntary act, or by the bare command of her husband, or be guilty of murder, treason, or robbery, (m) in company with, or by coercion of her husband, she is punishable as much as if she were sole. (n) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 1, s. 11. 1 Hale, 45, 47, 48, 516. Kel. 31. 2 Bla. Com. 29. The reason given is the heinousness of those crimes. I find no decision which warrants the position in the text, as to treason, murder, or robbery. Somerville's case, 1 And. 104, which is the only case where husband and wife have been convicted of treason, only shows that a wife may be convicted of treason with her husband. There Arden and his wife were charged with procuring Somerville to destroy the Queen, and both found guilty, but as none of the evidence is stated, it may have been that the wife was the instigator, and both properly convicted. In Somerset's case, which is the only case of a wife convicted, as well as her husband, as an accessory to a murder, according to 3 Inst. 50, the Earl and Countess were indicted as accessories before the fact, to the murder of Sir T. Overbury, the wife was arraigned alone first, and pleaded guilty, and being asked what she had to say why judgment of death should not be given against her, she said, 'I can much aggravate, but nothing extenuate my fault' (2 St. Tr. 957). Assuming, therefore, that the indictment was joint against both, the case only proves that the wife may, properly, be convicted upon her own confession, which indicates that she was the more guilty party; as it is clear she was in this case. See Hume's Hist. Eng. vol. 6, p. 68, &c. But as the Earl and Countess were separately arraigned, and on different days, and as the indictment against the Earl, as recited in his pardon (2 St. Tr. 1014), is against him alone, I infer that the Countess was indicted alone: if so, the case is merely that of a wife pleading guilty to [19] be guilty in the same manner of all those crimes which, like murder, are mala in se, and prohibited by the law of nature. (o) And in one case it appears to have been held by all the judges, upon an indictment against a married woman, for falsely swearing herself to be next of kin and procuring administration, that she was guilty of the offence, though her husband was with her when she took the oath. (p) But upon an indictment for disposing of forged notes, it was ruled that a woman was protected by being the wife of a man with whom she was indicted, who disposed of them in an indictment charging her alone as accessory, and unless in such a case she either pleaded that she committed the offence in company with her husband (as it seems she may, 1 Hale, 47. M. 37, Ed. 3. Rot. 34), or such appeared to be the case upon her trial, no question as to coercion could arise. In Reg. v. Alison, 8 C. & P. 418. Mr. J. Patteson mentions an old case, where a husband and wife, intending to destroy themselves, took poison together, the husband died, but the wife recovered, and was tried for the murder, and 'acquitted solely on the ground that, being the wife of the deceased, she was under his control, and inasmuch as the proposal to commit suicide had been first suggested by him, it was considered that she was not a free agent;' but I know from the very learned judge himself that he guarded against subscribing to the reason given for this decision. Probably the case referred to is an anonymous one, Moor. 754, where it is said, the question was, whether it was murder in the woman, and the recorder caused the special matter to be found, but no decision is stated, nor have I been able to find the case elsewhere. Before Somerville's case, 26 Eliz., and Somerset's case, A.D. 1615, I find no exception to the general rule that the coercion of the husband excuses the act of the wife. (See 27 Ass. 40, Stamf. P. C. 26, 27, 142. Poulton de Pace Regis. 130. Br. Ab. Coron. 108. Fitz. Ab. Coron. 130, 160, 199.) But after those cases I find the following exceptions in the Books:—Bac. Max. 57, excepts treason only. Dalton, c. 147, treason and murder, citing for the latter Mar. Lect. 12 (which I conceive refers to the Reading of Marrow, a Master in Chancery, in the time of Henry VII. See Willes v. Bridger, 2 B. & A. 282.) 1 Hale, P. C. pp. 45, 47, treason, murder and homicide; and p. 434, treason, murder, and manslaughter. Kelyng 31, an obiter dictum, murder only. Hawk. b. 1, c. 1, s. 11, treason, murder, and robbery. Blac. Com. vol. 1, p. 444, treason, and murder; vol. 4, p. 29, treason, and mala in se, as murder and the like. Hale, therefore, alone excepts manslaughter, and Hawkins introduces robbery, without any authority for so doing; and, on the contrary, in Reg. v. Cruse, 8 C. & P. 545, a case is cited, where Burrough, J., held that the rule extended to robbery. It seems long to have been considered that the mere presence of the husband was a coercion (see 4 Blac. Com. 28), and it was so contended in Reg. v. Cruse; and Bac. Max. 56, expressly states that a wife can neither be principal nor accessory by joining with her husband in a felony, because the law intends her to have no will; and in the next page he says, 'If husband and wife join in committing treason, the necessity of obedience doth not excuse the wife's offence, as it does in felony.' Now if this means that it does not absolutely excuse, as he has stated in the previous page, it is warranted by Somerville's case, which shows that a wife may be guilty of treason in company with her husband, and which would be an exception to the general rule, as stated by Bacon. So also would the conviction of a wife with her husband for murder in any case be an exception to the same rule. Dalton cites the exception from Bacon without the rule, and Hale follows Dalton, and the other writers follow Hale; and it seems by no means improbable that the exceptions of treason and murder, which seem to have sprung from Somerville's and Somerset's case, and which were probably exceptions to the rule as stated by Bacon, have been continued by writers without adverting to their origin, or observing that the presence of the husband is no longer considered an absolute excuse, but only affords a prima facie presumption that the wife acted by his coercion. See the learned argument of Mr. Carrington in Reg. v. Cruse, 8 C. & P. 541. In 1849, G. Manning and his wife were jointly convicted of murder, but the question discussed in this note was not raised, probably because upon the evidence it was plain she was the more active party in the offence. The case as reported 2 C. & K. 887, and 1 D. C. C. R. 467, does not advert to this question, but the charge of the recorder to the grand jury, 2 C. & K. 903, contains some observations upon it. See Reg. v. Smith, 1 D. & B. 553, which is quite in accordance with this note, post p. 35, C. S. G.

Where, on an indictment against husband and wife for jointly receiving stolen goods, it appeared that a burglary was committed by their two daughters, who were traced to Cranbrooke, where their father and mother then lived, with a quantity of the property stolen, with which they went towards their father's house; and on the same night, between nine and ten o'clock, the mother and her two daughters went to the house of a draper, and brought (s) two trunks, a red and blue one, and a person who lived next door to the prisoners saw them and their two daughters, on the next day, in the kitchen, where the two daughters were packing a blue box, and the two boxes were afterwards found in London, in consequence of a statement made by the wife, who, when the house was searched, denied that any of the stolen goods were in it, and made various other false statements; and a quantity of the stolen property was found concealed in different parts of the house; the jury found both the husband and wife guilty; it was held, that as the charge against the husband and wife was joint, and it had not been left to the jury to say whether she received the goods in the absence of the husband, the conviction of the wife could not be supported, though she had been more active than her husband (t).

Joint indictment against husband and wife for receiving stolen goods.

On an indictment against husband and wife for receiving stolen sugar, it appeared that the husband received it in the first instance in the absence of his wife. Some remains of the sugar were found on searching in a sink in the kitchen, and the wife stated that she and her daughter had washed all the sugar away, and that they had burnt the bags in which it was contained, and that she thought it a hard case that she and her husband should be at a loss of four or five pounds. Coltman, J., told the jury that 'if the husband received the property, knowing it to be stolen, and if the wife received it from him with the like knowledge, and with the purpose of aiding and assisting him in the object which he had in view in receiving it, by turning it to pecuniary profit or in other like manner, although primâ facie she might be supposed to be acting under the coercion of her husband, that was rebutted by the active part which she took in the matter with the intention above mentioned. But if the part she took was merely for the purpose of concealing her husband's guilt, and of screening him from the consequences, then she ought to be acquitted. A wife cannot be

Where a wife receives stolen property from her husband, it must be proved that she took an active part in the matter at the time of the receipt.

As the wife met the prosecutor at a railway station, and induced him to go to a lonely spot where her husband wounded him (see the note to the case), it is clear she was an accessory before the fact, and responsible as such for her acts in the absence of her husband, and under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, she ought to have been convicted as such accessory. The marginal note is 'upon a joint charge against husband and wife, of receiving stolen goods, the wife cannot, properly, be convicted, if the husband is,' which seems not to be warranted by the case, which, at most, only decides that where there is no evidence whatever, that the wife was present when the goods were received, or of her conduct when they were received, she ought not to be jointly convicted with her husband. convicted of harbouring her husband, when he has committed a felony, and the mere circumstance of her attempting to conceal what may lead to his detection appears to come within the same principle.' (u)

Goods stolen by a husband and delivered by him to his wife, and no evidence as to what took place before or at the time when the wife received them.

On an indictment against a wife for receiving stolen goods, it appeared that her husband stole the goods from a shop, and delivered them into her hands. Whether the articles were stolen at one or at several times, or delivered to the prisoner at one or at different times, did not appear. The husband absconded, his house was searched, and a box taken from the prisoner, after a struggle on her part to retain it. It contained pawn-tickets which related to the stolen goods. Several of these tickets had been given for articles pledged by the prisoner, who falsely stated as to some that they were birthday presents, and as to others that they were articles in which she dealt. In two instances the prisoner had sent persons to pledge some of the articles, and had received the pawn-tickets and money lent by the pawnbrokers. The jury were told that, as her husband had delivered the stolen articles to the prisoner, the law presumed that she acted under his control in receiving them; but that this presumption might be rebutted: if therefore they were satisfied that at the time when the prisoner received the articles she knew that they were stolen, and in receiving them acted not by reason of any coercion of her husband, but voluntarily, and with a fraudulent intention, she might be found guilty; and on her being found guilty the questions were reserved, whether the direction was right, and whether on the evidence there was any case for the jury; and it was held that the case failed on both points; if there had been plenty of evidence there would have been no case to go to the jury; but it appeared that there was no evidence at all. (v)

A statement of the wife may be evidence that she received separately from her husband.

Where on an indictment for larceny it appeared that the goods were found in the house of the prisoner's husband, who was a blind man, and when they were found the prisoner said she had bought them a long time before; Erle, J., said that if the prisoner had said nothing, and the goods had simply been found in the house of the husband, there would have been no evidence to go to the jury. But as she said she bought the goods, it must be left to the jury to decide whether the goods were in the possession of the prisoner or her husband; and the jury were told that if they were of opinion that the goods were in the possession of the wife without the consent and control of her husband, they must find her guilty. (w)

The prisoner was indicted together with her husband and one Prishous for burglary and receiving. The jury found Prishous guilty of housebreaking, and the prisoner and her husband of receiving. Part of the stolen property was found in the house

(u) Reg. v. McClarens, 3 Cox C. C. 425. The wife was acquitted.

(v) Reg. v. Brooks, 1 Dears, C. C. 184. This decision is clearly right on the ground that there was no evidence whatever as to the guilty knowledge or conduct of the prisoner at the time the goods were received. Parke, B., said that, as the prisoner received the goods from her husband, 'it is difficult to see how she could be guilty of this offence.' With all deference, it is perfectly easy to suggest cases where a wife may be convicted of receiving stolen goods from her husband. Suppose she incites him to steal a diamond necklace for her, and he does so in her absence, delivers it to her, and she wears it; or, suppose a thief brings stolen goods to a house, and the husband declines to receive them, but is induced by the wife so to do, and afterwards the husband delivers them to the wife; it cannot be doubted that in these and the like cases she may be convicted, for the plain reason that she is acting in no way under his coercion. where the prisoner and her husband lived together, and the evidence warranted the jury in convicting the husband of receiving; but the only evidence which affected the prisoner was that, some time after the robbery, in the absence of her husband, she produced a quantity of the stolen property, and said it was to be destroyed, and said she had been changing some foreign money, and thought she was going to be taken up for it, and asked a young woman to come down, if she were taken, and say a foreign captain had given her part of the stolen property. It was contended that there was no evidence that she received the property either in the absence of her husband or from any other person than him; and that if there was evidence for the jury, the question would be whether she received it from him, and if not, whether she received it in his absence; but Martin, B., ruled that there was evidence for the jury, and did not leave either of these questions to them. It was held, however, that the questions ought to have been left to the jury, as it was perfectly consistent with the facts that the goods might have been received by the husband at his own house, and so have come into the possession of the wife through her husband in a manner that did not render her liable to be convicted. (x)

Where on an indictment against husband and wife for jointly receiving stolen fowls, it appeared that the fowls were found in the husband's house, and the wife said she had bought part from people who came to the house in his absence, and that her husband bought some at Shrewsbury market on Wednesday; and the husband afterwards said that he was not out of the place where he resided on the Wednesday, and had bought 'the fowls' from the person who stole them; so that the evidence showed either a joint receiving by both or a separate receiving by each in the absence of the other, and the jury found both guilty; it was held that, assuming the receiving to have been joint, the wife was entitled to be acquitted, as the offence was committed in her husband's presence; and assuming the receiving to have been separate, the offence against both was not proved as laid, and that the husband was rightly convicted, but the wife not. (y)

Upon an indictment against husband and wife for jointly receiving stolen goods, the jury found that the wife received them without the control or knowledge of and apart from her husband, and that the husband afterwards adopted his wife's receipt; and it was held that, upon this finding, the conviction of the husband could not be supported. The word, 'adopted' might mean that the husband passively consented to what his wife had done without taking any active part in the matter, and in that case he would not be guilty of receiving. Or, it might mean, that he did take such active part; but this rigid construction ought not to be put upon the word 'adopted.' (z) But where the thief delivered the stolen property

(x) Reg. v. Wardroper, Bell C. C. 249. Martin, B., at the trial rightly treated the indictment as joint and several. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 14; but there was no evidence of a receipt by the wife in the absence of her husband, so as to bring the case within that clause.

(y) Reg. v. Matthews, 1 Den. C. C. 596. There was nothing to show any activity on the part of the wife at the time of the receipt. See now the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 94, by which persons charged with a joint receipt of stolen property may be convicted of separate receipts.

(z) Reg. v. Dring, D. & B. 329. It was doubted in this case, whether sec. 14 of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, applied to successive receipts of the whole property to the prisoner's wife in his absence, and she then paid sixpence on account, but the amount to be paid was not then fixed; and afterwards the prisoner and the thief met, agreed on the price, and the prisoner paid the balance; it was held that the receipt was not complete till the price was fixed, and the money paid, and consequently that the prisoner was rightly convicted of receiving the stolen property. (yy)

Where a jury found a wife guilty of stealing from the person, and her husband guilty of receiving the property stolen knowing it to have been stolen, and also found that the wife acted voluntarily and without any restraint on the part of the husband, and that he received the property from his wife knowing it to have been stolen by her; it was held that the husband was rightly convicted of feloniously receiving the property from his wife. (zz)

Not answerable for her husband's breach of duty.

Where the wife is to be considered merely as the servant of the husband, she will not be answerable for the consequences of his breach of duty, however fatal, though she may be privy to his conduct. C. Squire and his wife were indicted for the murder of a boy, who was bound as a parish apprentice to the husband, and it appeared in evidence that both prisoners had used the apprentice in a most cruel and barbarous manner, and that the wife had occasionally committed the cruelties in the absence of the husband. But the surgeon who opened the body deposed that, in his judgment, the boy died from debility and want of proper food and nourishment, and not from the wounds, &c., which he had received. Lawrence, J., directed the jury, that as the wife was the servant of the husband, it was not her duty to provide the apprentice with sufficient food and nourishment, and that she was not guilty of any breach of duty in neglecting to do so; though, if the husband had allowed her sufficient food for the apprentice, and she had wilfully witholden it from him, then she would have been guilty. But that here the fact was otherwise; and therefore, though in foro conscientie the wife was equally guilty with the husband, yet in point of law she could not be said to be guilty of not providing the apprentice with sufficient food and nourishment. (a)

In inferior misdemeanors a wife may be indicted, together with her husband; (b) and she may be punished with him for keeping stolen; but sec. 17 of the Statute of Frauds, 29 C. 2, c. 3 is, 'except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same,' and no one ever doubted that a receipt of the whole was within this clause.

(b) See Reg. v. Martin, 8 A. & E. 481, where husband and wife were convicted of obtaining goods by false pretences, and the judgment reversed on another ground. There is no doubt that in all misdemeanors a wife may be jointly convicted with her husband, as she may be proved to have acted voluntarily; but I find no authority that the same rule as to coercion, which applies to felonies, does not extend to misdemeanors. On the contrary, Rex

v. Price, 8 C. & P. 19, and Anon. Matth. Dig. Cr. Law, 262, show that the rule applies to the misdemeanor of uttering base coin; and the reason given in Rex v. Dixon, 10 Mod. 335, and Reg. v. Williams, Salk. 384, as to the keeping of gaming and bawdy houses, that the wife may probably have as great, nay, a greater share in the criminal management of the house, than the husband, tends to show, that, in order to convict the wife she must be acting voluntarily, and not under coercion. In Reg. v. Cruse, 8 C. & P. 541, the wife had taken a very active part. Reg. v. Williams, and Reg. v. Ingram, Salk. 384, were in arrest of judgment, and therefore the Court would presume, if necessary, that the wife had acted voluntarily; and Rex v. Dixon was on demurrer, and the Court would, and it seems did, hold the indictment good, a bawdy house; for this is an offence as to the government of the house in which the wife has a principal share; and also such an offence as may generally be presumed to be managed by the intrigues of the sex. (c) So a wife might be jointly convicted with her husband of an assault, upon an indictment against both, for feloniously inflicting a bodily injury dangerous to life, under 1 Vict. c. 88, s. 5. (d) But where the husband and wife were indicted for a misdemeanor, in uttering counterfeit coin, it was held that the same rule which applied to felonies should apply to that case. (e) But a prosecution for a conspiracy is not maintainable against a husband and wife only; because they are esteemed but as one person in law, and are presumed to have but one will. (f)

In all cases where the wife offends alone without the company or coercion of her husband, she is responsible for her offence as much as any feme sole. (g) Thus she may be indicted alone for a riot; (h) may be convicted of selling gin against the injunctions of the 9 Geo. 2, c. 23, (i) or for recusancy. (k) And she may be indicted for being a common scold; (l) for assault and battery; (m) for forestalling; (n) for forcible entry; (o) or for keeping a bawdy house, if her husband do not live with her; (p) and for trespass or slander. (q) And she may also be indicted for receiving stolen goods of her own separate act without the privity of her husband; or if he, knowing thereof, leave the house and forsake her company, she alone shall be guilty as accessory; (r) and though in a serious offence, such as that of sending threatening letters, the husband be an agent in the transaction, yet if he be so ignorantly, by the artifice of the wife, she alone is punishable. (s) And generally a feme covert shall answer as much as if she were sole for any offence not capital against the common law or statute; and if it be of such a nature that it may be committed by her alone, without the concurrence of the husband, she may be punished for it without the husband, by way of indictment; which being a proceeding grounded merely on the breach of the law, the

because it might be proved that the wife was not under coercion. There is no authority, therefore, that the rule does not extend to misdemeanors, and the tendency of the offences certainly is that it does. C. S. G.

Coercion of the husband not to be presumed when he is not present at the commission of the crime, though it were committed by his procurement. The husband may be accessory before the fact to the felony of the wife.

Presumption of coercion a primâ facie presumption only, and may be rebutted.

It is no excuse for the wife that she committed the offence by her husband's order and procurement, if she committed it in his absence; at least it is not to be presumed in such case that she acted by coercion. S. Morris was tried for uttering a forged order, knowing it to be forged, and her husband for procuring her to commit the offence; and it appeared that her husband ordered her to do it, but that she uttered the instrument in his absence. Upon a case reserved, the judges held that the presumption of coercion at the time of the uttering did not arise, as the husband was absent at that time; and that the wife was properly convicted of the uttering, and the husband of the procuring. (u) In a previous case, where the prisoner was indicted for forgery and uttering Bank of England notes, the principal witness stated, that, in consequence of a conversation which he had had some time before with the prisoner's husband, he went to the husband's shop; that the husband was not present, but that he saw the prisoner, who beckoned him to go into an inner room; that she followed him into the room, and that he there told her what her husband had said to him; upon which they agreed about the business, and he bought of her three two pound notes, at one pound four shillings each; that he paid her for the notes, and was to receive eight shillings in change; and that when he was putting the notes into his pocket-book, and before he had received the change, the husband looked into the room, but did not come in or interfere with the business further than by saying, 'Get on with you.' After this the witness and the prisoner returned into the shop where the husband was; the prisoner gave him the change, and both the prisoner and her husband cautioned him to be careful. The counsel for the prisoner objected that she acted under the coercion of her husband; that the evidence would have been sufficient to have convicted the husband, if both the husband and wife had been upon their trial; and that therefore the prisoner ought to be acquitted. (v) But Thomson, B., said, 'I am very clear as to the law on this point. The law, out of tenderness to the wife, if a felony be committed in the presence of the husband, raises a presumption primâ facie, and primâ facie only, as is clearly laid down by Lord Hale, that it was done under his coercion: (w) but it is absolutely necessary that the husband should in such case be actually present, and taking a part in the transaction. Here it is entirely the act of the wife; it is indeed in consequence of a communication previously with the husband, that the witness applies to the wife; but she is ready to deal, and has on her person the articles which she delivers to the witness. There was a putting off before the husband came: and it was sufficient if before that time she did that which was necessary to complete the crime. The coercion must be at the time of the act done, and then the law out of tenderness refers it primâ facie to the coercion of the husband. But when the crime has been completed in his absence, no subsequent act of his (although it might possibly make him an accessory to the felony of the wife) can be referred to what was done in his absence. (x) And it seems that the correct rule is, that if a felony be shown to have been committed by the wife in the presence of the husband, the primâ facie presumption is that it was done by his coercion; but such presumption may be rebutted by proof that the wife was the more active party, or by showing an incapacity in the husband to coerce. Thus, if the husband were a cripple, and confined to his bed, his presence then would not be sufficient to exonerate the wife. (y) Where, therefore, in a case of arson a husband and wife were tried together, and it appeared that the husband, though present, was a cripple, and bed-ridden in the room; it was held that the circumstances under which the husband was, repelled the presumption of coercion (z)

A feme covert is not guilty of felony in stealing her husband's goods; because a husband and wife are considered but as one person in law, and the husband, by endowing his wife at the marriage with all his worldly goods, gives her a kind of interest in them: for which cause even a stranger cannot commit larceny in taking the goods of the husband by the delivery of the wife, as he may by taking away the wife by force and against her will, together with the goods of the husband. (a)

The wife of a member of a friendly society is not guilty of larceny if she steal the money of the society deposited in a box in her husband's custody, which box is kept locked by the stewards, of whom he is not one; for the husband has a joint property in such money. (b)

The following positions seem fairly deducible from the cases upon this subject:—1st. There is no objection on demurrer, to an indictment, which charges husband and wife jointly with the commission of an offence; for the indictment is joint and several, and both may be convicted, if it appear the wife was not acting under the coercion of the husband, or either of them. 2ndly. There is no objection, either in arrest of judgment, or on error, to the joint conviction of husband and wife of the same offence; for she may have been the instigator, and both guilty. 3rdly. Upon the trial of husband and wife, the primâ facie presumption is, that she acted under his coercion, provided he were actually present at the time the felony was committed. If, therefore, nothing appear but that the felony was committed while they were both together, the jury ought to be directed to acquit the wife. 4thly. This presumption is primâ facie only, and may be rebutted, either by showing that the wife was the instigator or more active party, or that the husband, though present, was incapable of coercing, as that he was a cripple, and bed-ridden, or that the wife was the stronger of the two. C. S. G. In Reg. v. William & Emma Jones, Gloucester Sum. Ass. 1841, Coltman, J., after attentively reading this note, said that it was quite correct. MSS. C. S. G.

(a) 1 Hale, 514, where it is put thus: 'if she take or steal the goods of her husband and deliver them to B., who knowing it, carries them away, this seems no felony, in B.; for they are taken quasi by the consent of her husband. Yet trespass lies against B. for such taking; for it is a trespass; but in favorem vite it shall not be adjudged a felony, and so I take the law to be, notwithstanding the various opinions.' And he cites Dalton, cap. 104, p. 268, 269, ex lecturâ Cooke (new edit. c. 157, p. 504.) And see 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33, s. 32. 3 Inst. 110. 2 East P. C. 558.

(b) Rex v. Willis, R. & M. C. C. R. 375. So of goods delivered to the husband to keep. Dalt. c. 157.

And a stranger cannot commit larceny of the husband's goods by the delivery of the wife, unless he is her adulterer.

And, where the prisoner was an apprentice to the prosecutor, and the prosecutor's wife had continual custody of the key of the closet where her husband's plate was usually locked up, and she had pawned some articles of it in order to supply the prisoner with pocket-money, but the articles she pawned were not those which the prisoner was charged with stealing; and the prisoner confessed that he took the articles mentioned in the indictment from the closet, and a pawnbroker proved that he received them in pledge from the prisoner, but it did not appear by what means the prisoner had gained access to the closet from which they were taken; the Court held, that the prosecutor's wife, having the constant keeping of the key of the closet where the plate was usually locked up, and it appearing that the prisoner could not have taken it without her privity or consent, it might be presumed that he had received it from her, and therefore he ought to be acquitted. (c) But if the wife steal the goods of her husband, and deliver them to B., who knowing it carries them away, B. being the adulterer of the wife, this, according to a very good opinion, would be felony in B.; for in such case no consent of the husband can be presumed. (d)

Where an adulterer takes the goods in company with the wife, he may be guilty of larceny.

Thus, where the prosecutor left his wife in the care of his house and property, and during his absence the prisoner, who had lodged for some time previously in the house, took a great many boxes, &c., from the house, and left them at a house to which he had gone a day or two before with the prosecutor's wife, passing her for his own, and where he had hired lodgings; and he soon afterwards brought her with him to the lodgings, where they lived together till he was apprehended, and the wife, who took a small basket with her, swore that there was none of the property but what she had herself taken, or given to the prisoner to take; and the jury found that the prisoner stole the property jointly with the wife; it was held that this was larceny in the prisoner; for though the wife consented, it must be considered that it was done invito domino. (e)

Thompson's case.

So, where the prisoner, who lodged at the house of the prosecutor, went away with the prosecutor's wife to Birmingham, where they lived together as man and wife for more than a year; they took with them from the prosecutor's house a box belonging to the prisoner, containing the wife's wearing apparel and a coffee-pot and two candlesticks, the property of the prosecutor. The coffee-pot and candlesticks were used by them at Birmingham, and afterwards sold by the wife, and the prisoner there pledged some articles of wearing apparel, and applied the money to his own use. The jury were directed to find the prisoner guilty, if they thought either that the prisoner, going away with the prosecutor's wife for the purpose of an adulterous intercourse, was engaged jointly with her in taking the goods, or that, not being a party to the original taking, the prisoner, after arriving at Birmingham, appropriated any part of the goods to his own use. The jury having found the prisoner guilty, on the ground that there was a joint taking by the prisoner and the wife, the judges were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was right. (f)

So, where the prosecutor and his wife were on bad terms, and she arranged with the prisoner to elope with him and live together as man and wife, and the prisoner desired her to bring all the money she could, and to get the money and boxes of clothes ready by a particular night, when he would come for them and take her away; and she put £17 into the boxes, which already contained her clothes, two watches, some silk handkerchiefs, and about £4, and sat up after her husband had gone to bed till the prisoner came, took him into the room where her husband was asleep, and he took the boxes away, and, if her husband had remained asleep, she would have gone off with the prisoner, but, as her husband awoke, she was obliged to stay. It did not appear that any adultery had been committed. The boxes were locked by the wife, and were found in that state in the possession of the prisoner, and were unlocked with keys produced by the wife. Coleridge, J., directed the jury that, if the prisoner took any of the husband's property, there then being an intention to commit adultery with the wife, he was guilty of larceny; and that, having told the wife to bring all the money that she could, it was for them to consider whether he did not intend to steal the property taken away, although he might not, at the time of the taking, know exactly of what that property consisted. (g)

An intention to commit adultery is sufficient.

Where the prisoner lodged at the prosecutor's house, and knew that he would have to go out very early in the morning, and engaged a porter to be near the house at seven o'clock with his cart; the prisoner and the wife of the prosecutor were then jointly engaged in the house in packing up the articles alleged to be stolen in boxes, and when so packed the prisoner brought the boxes out, and they were put in the cart and driven to the station, the prisoner, the wife, and her three children accompanying them, and all went by the train to Leeds. A fortnight afterwards the prisoner and the wife were found living together at Leeds, in a house which she had taken in her own name, and all the property taken was found there. The wife was called as witness for the prisoner, and swore that they neither had committed adultery, nor gone away for that purpose. The jury were told that, if they were satisfied that the prisoner and the wife, when they took the property, went away for the purpose of having adulterous intercourse, and had afterwards effected that purpose, they ought to convict; but that if they believed the wife, that they did not go away with any such purpose, and had never committed adultery, they ought to acquit. The jury found the prisoner guilty of larceny, and the conviction was affirmed. (h) put them there; the name of the wife was changed, and a passage ticket taken out in the joint name of Walker. Lefroy, C. J., left the case to the jury, and the prisoner was convicted. Reg. v. Glassie, 7 Cox 1. This case is extremely ill-reported, and very little reliance can be placed on it. The facts above stated are culled from the different parts of the report.

Featherstone's case.

So, where a wife took thirty-five sovereigns and some clothes from her husband's bedroom, and as she left the house said to the prisoner, 'It's all right, come on;' and he left in a few minutes after, and they were traced to a public-house, where they slept together, and when taken into custody the prisoner had twenty-two sovereigns upon him: the jury found him guilty of larceny, on the ground that he received the sovereigns from the wife, knowing that she took them without the authority of her husband; and the conviction was held right; for when a wife becomes an adulteress, she thereby determines her quality of wife, and her property in her husband's goods ceases; and in this case the prisoner was the accomplice of the wife, assisted her, and took the sovereigns, knowing that she had taken them without the husband's consent. (i)

Adulterer convicted of receiving.

The prisoner, having lodged in the prosecutor's house about a year, left, but there was no evidence as to the time or manner of his leaving. The next day the prosecutor's wife left, with only a small bundle under her arm. The prisoner was apprehended on board a vessel bound to Quebec, in company with the wife, who was passing under the name of Mrs. Deer, and the prisoner had tickets for Quebec in the names of Mr. and Mrs. Deer. A great quantity of the prosecutor's property, very much more than could have been comprised in the wife's bundle, and not confined to the wife's clothes, was found in the prisoner's cabin and on his person, on the 10th of April, and it had been missed on the evening of the 9th of that month. There was no other evidence who had taken the articles from the house. The jury found the prisoner guilty of receiving, knowing the goods to have been stolen; and it was held that there was 'some evidence to support the conviction.' (k)

Where the wife alone takes property to her adulterer's lodgings he cannot be convicted on mere proof that the property is in his lodgings.

But where the prisoner does not take away the goods in company with the wife, but she brings them to his lodgings, and there commits adultery with him, and no distinct possession of the goods on the part of the prisoner is shown, he cannot be convicted. The prisoner induced the prosecutor's wife to go to his lodgings, and she took with her a quantity of goods, not consisting of female apparel, or of articles exclusively for female use, and they were put into the prisoner's lodgings, and the prisoner and the prosecutor's wife slept together there as man and wife; but the goods could not be traced to the individual possession of the prisoner by any particular act of his, but it could only be shown that they were found at his lodgings, some of them in the room in which he and the prosecutor's wife slept together; and it was held that there was not enough to convict the prisoner. (l)

house, agreed with his wife that they should go away and live together in adultery. He went away leaving the husband and wife together; then the husband went out to work, and then the wife went after the prisoner. They were overtaken on the road in company together, and he was carrying a handbox containing goloshes and boots, the wearing apparel of the wife of the prosecutor, and so, in law, his property; and it was held that the prisoner ought not to have been convicted, as he was only assisting in carrying away the necessary wearing apparel of the wife. (m)

Upon an indictment for larceny, it appeared that one prisoner was uncle and the other cousin of the prosecutor's wife, and that on the nights of the 7th and 10th of February they went to the prosecutor's house, without his knowledge, after he had gone to bed. The wife admitted them on each occasion. The first night they packed and took away, in the wife's presence, and with her consent, a box containing property of the prosecutor, and on the second night they took, in her presence and with her consent, a carpet and cooking-pots. On the 11th, after the prosecutor had gone to his work, the cousin went to the house, and with the wife's consent carried away a bed, and placed it in a granary at a short distance, requesting the person who gave him permission to do so not to inform the prosecutor. The cousin then returned to the house, and went away with the wife, taking with him a basket containing property of the prosecutor. The wife left without her husband's knowledge or assent, and without the intention of returning; they went together to the house of the uncle. The prosecutor and a constable went thither that evening, and the uncle denied he had any property of the prosecutor's; the house was searched, and a milk jug and several other articles of the prosecutor's were found in a bedroom; and boxes and other articles of the prosecutor's were found in an adjoining house. The boxes had upon them the address, 'Henry Avery, to be left at the Rose Inn, Folkstone.' There was no evidence that the wife remained at the uncle's house, or that she had committed adultery with either prisoner, or intended to do so. The jury found that the prisoners took the goods without the knowledge or consent of the husband, and with the intention to deprive him absolutely of his property in them, and found the prisoners guilty. But it was held that the conviction was wrong. No adultery was shown to have taken place, or to have been intended; the goods were taken with the consent of the wife, and she could not be guilty of larceny in simply taking the goods of her husband; and if a stranger do no more than simply assist a wife in taking the goods of her husband, as the wife, as principal, cannot be guilty of larceny, the stranger, as aider, cannot be guilty. In this case it larceny if he merely assist the adulteress in carrying away her necessary wearing apparel.

Where adultery is neither committed nor intended, a person is not guilty of larceny in aiding a wife in taking away her husband's goods.

(m) Reg. v. Fitch, D. & B. 187. In Reg. v. Tollett, C. & M. 112, Carrington contended that if a wife eloped with an adulterer it would be no larceny in the adulterer to assist in carrying away her clothes; but Coleridge, J., told the jury that 'if he elopes with an adulteress, who takes her clothes with them, it is larceny to steal her clothes, just as much as it could be larceny to steal her husband's wearing apparel or anything else that was his property.' This case was not cited in Reg. v. Fitch, but Coleridge, J., concurred in that decision, which seems properly to overrule his direction in Reg. v. Tollett; for where the necessary wearing apparel alone is taken, the necessity for which it is taken furnishes the motive, and negatives the animus furandi. C. S. G.

was not left to the jury to say whether the prisoners were acting as principals when the act was done, or whether the wife was the principal, and the prisoners merely aiding and assisting her; and that state of the case which is most favourable to the prisoners must be assumed, and therefore the conviction must be quashed. (n)

not accessory for receiving her husband.

A feme covert shall not be deemed accessory to a felony for receiving her husband who has been guilty of it, as her husband shall be for receiving her; nor shall be a principal in receiving her husband when his offence is treason; for she is sub potestate viri, and bound to receive him. (o) Neither is she affected by receiving, jointly with her husband, any other offender. (p)

against husband and wife.

It is no ground for dismissing an indictment for burglary or larceny as to the wife, that she is charged with her husband and described as his wife; for the indictment is joint and several according as the facts may appear; and on such an indictment the wife may be convicted, and the husband acquitted. (q)

Evidence of
being the wife.

In burglary or larceny, if a man and woman are indicted, and the woman pretends to be the man's wife, but is not so described in the indictment, the onus of proving that she is his wife is upon her. Thus where Thomas Wharton and Jane Jones were indicted for burglary, and the woman pleaded that she was married to Wharton, and would not plead to the name of Jones, the grand jury who found the bill was sent for, and in their presence, and with their consent, the Court inserted the name Jane Wharton, otherwise Jones, not calling her the wife of Thomas Wharton, but giving her the addition of spinster, upon which she pleaded; and the Court told her that if she could prove that she was married to Wharton before the burglary, she should have the advantage of it: but on the trial she could not, and was found guilty, and judgment given upon her. (r) If a woman be indicted as a single woman, and pleads to the felony, that is primâ facie evidence that she is not a feme covert, but is not conclusive of the fact. (s) And in such a case such evidence must be given as to satisfy the jury that the prisoners are in fact husband and wife, in the same way as to convince them of any other fact. (t) But cohabitation and reputation will be sufficient evidence upon such point. William and Mary Atkinson were indicted for disposing of forged country bank notes; and it appeared that the man disposed of them in the presence of the woman, at a public-house, to which they went together to meet the person to whom they were disposed of; that the man went thither by appointment, and the woman had a bundle of the same notes in her pocket. There was evidence, on the part of the prosecution, that they had lived and passed for man and wife for some months; upon which it was put to Gibbs, C. B., whether the woman was not entitled to an acquittal, and he thought she was; and the counsel for the prosecution at once acquiesced. (u) Where, upon an indictment against a woman for harbouring a murderer, knowing him to have committed the murder, it was probable that a marriage had taken place between the parties, in Ireland, at a place where the registers were very imperfectly kept, and the parties had for many years considered each other as man and wife, no evidence was offered for the prosecution, with the sanction of the Court. (v) Where, however, the indictment states the woman to be the wife of the person with whom she is jointly indicted, no evidence is necessary to show that she is the wife. (w)

When parties have lived together as husband and wife.

IV. Upon the plea or excuse of ignorance, it may be shortly observed, that it will apply only to ignorance or mistake of fact, and not to any error in point of law. For ignorance of the municipal law of the kingdom is not allowed to excuse any one that is of the age of discretion and compos mentis, from its penalties when broken; on the ground that every such person is bound to know the law, and presumed to have that knowledge. (x) And it is no defence for a foreigner charged with a crime committed in England, that he did not know he was doing wrong, the act not being an offence in his own country. (y) Where, therefore, two Frenchmen were committed on a charge of murder in a duel, and alleged that they were ignorant of the law of England, and believed that acting as seconds in a fair duel was not punishable here, as it was not punishable in France, and that this was a fair duel, it was held that they were precisely in the same position as if they were native subjects of England, and the Court refused to bail them. (z) And as a ship, public or private, on the high seas, is, for the purpose of jurisdiction over crimes committed therein, a part of the territory to which the ship belongs, a person voluntarily coming on board an English ship, is as much amenable to the criminal law of England as if he came voluntarily into an English county, and ignorance of the law is no more an excuse Ignorance.

As in every case, except bigamy and criminal conversation, living together as man and wife is sufficient evidence of a marriage, Morris v. Miller, 111. R. 632. Woodgate v. Potts, 2 L. & K. 457, there seems to have been abundant evidence in this case of a marriage between the parties; but, assuming it not to be so, it is deserving of consideration whether if a woman received and comforted a felon, honestly believing him to be her husband, that would not entitle her to an acquittal, upon the ground that no guilty intention could exist under such circumstances, but, on the contrary, she was doing that which she honestly believed to be her duty to do. C. S. G.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OF PRINCIPALS AND ACCESSORIES.

WHERE two or more are to be brought to justice for one and the same felony, they are considered in the light either—I. Of principals in the first degree. II. Principals in the second degree. III. Accessories before the fact; or, IV. Accessories after the fact. And in either of these characters they will be felons in consideration of law; for he who takes any part in a felony, whether it be a felony at common law or by statute, is in construction of law a felon, according to the share which he takes in the crime. (a)

[26]

I. Principals in the first degree are those who have actually and with their own hands committed the fact; and it does not appear necessary to say anything in this place by way of explanation of the nature of their guilt, which will be detailed in treating of the different offences in the course of the work.

Principals in the first degree.

II. Principals in the second degree are those who were present, aiding and abetting at the commission of the fact. They are generally termed aiders and abettors, and sometimes accomplices; but the latter appellation will not serve as a term of definition, as it includes all the participes criminis, whether they are considered in strict legal propriety as principals in the first or second degree, or merely as accessories before or after the fact. (b) The distinction between principals in the first, and principals in the second degree; or, to speak more properly, the course and order of proceeding against offenders founded upon that distinction, appears to have been unknown to the most ancient writers on our law, who considered the persons present aiding and abetting in no other light than as accessories at the fact. (c) But as such accessories they were not liable to be brought to trial till the principal offenders should be convicted or outlawed; a rule productive of much mischief, as the course of justice was frequently arrested by the death or escape of the principal, or from his remaining unknown or concealed. And with a view to obviate this mischief the judges by degrees adopted a different rule; and at length it became settled law that all those who are present, aiding and abetting, when a felony is committed are principals in the second degree. (d)

Principals in the second degree.

In order to render a person a principal in the second degree, or an aider and abettor, he must be present aiding and abetting at the fact, or ready to afford assistance if necessary; but the presence need not be a strict actual immediate presence, such a presence as would make him an eye or ear witness of what passes, but may be a constructive presence. So that if several persons set out together, or in small parties, upon one common design, be it murder or other felony, or for any other purpose unlawful in itself, and each takes the part assigned him; some to commit the fact, others to watch at proper distances and stations to prevent a surprise, or to favour, if need be, the escape of those who are more immediately engaged; they are all, provided the fact be committed, in the eye of the law present at it; for it was made a common cause with them, each man operated in his station at one and the same instant, towards the same common end, and the part each man took tended to give countenance, encouragement and protection to the whole gang, and to insure the success of their common enterprise. (e) But there must be some participation; therefore if a special verdict against a man as a principal does not show that he did the act, or was present when it was done, or did some act at the time in aid which shows that he was present, aiding and assisting, or that he was of the same party, in the same pursuit, and under the same expectation of mutual defence and support with those who did the fact, the prisoner cannot be convicted. (f) So, if several are out for the purpose of committing a felony, and upon alarm and pursuit run different ways, and one of them maim a pursuer to avoid being taken, the others are not to be considered as principals in that maiming. (g) And it is not sufficient to make a man a principal in uttering a forged note, that he came with the utterer to the town where it was uttered, went out with him from the inn where they put up a little before he uttered it, joined him again in the street a short time after the uttering, and at a little distance from the place of uttering, and ran away when the utterer was apprehended. (h) This case has, however, been considered as having been decided upon the principle, that the circumstances which will amount to a constructive presence at common law will not be sufficient for the same purpose upon an indictment under a statute. (i) The general rule, however, applies to offences by statute as well as at common law, viz., that all present at the time of committing an offence are principals, although one only acts, if they are confederates, and engaged in a common design, of which the offence is part. (k) And it has been considered, in a case where three persons were charged with uttering a forged note, that other acts done by all of them jointly, or by any of them separately, shortly before the offence, may be given in evidence to show the confederacy and common purpose, although such acts constitute distinct felonies. (l) And also that what was found upon each may be proved against each to make out such confederacy, although it were not found until some interval after the commission of the offence. (m) sacks from a vessel to the prosecutor's warehouse, and McCarthy was employed by the prosecutor to load the sacks out of the vessel into the trams on which they were carried. The trams belonged to Kelly. Whilst one load was being conveyed to the warehouse, Kelly said to McCarthy, 'It's all right,' and shortly afterwards McCarthy emptied some oats out of two sacks which were on a tram close to the vessel, into a nosebag, which he then placed under the tram. Kelly, at this time, was absent with a load; but returned in a few minutes to the vessel with an empty tram, took the nosebag from under the tram, where McCarthy had placed it, and put it on the tram, and drove off with it, McCarthy being, at the time Kelly took the nosebag from under the tram, on the vessel, which lay close to the tram, and within three or four yards of Kelly. It was submitted that Kelly was entitled to be acquitted, as he was not present at the time when the oats were stolen. the transaction.

Upon an indictment for larceny against Hornby and W. G., it appeared that W. G. was the foreman of the prosecutor, a canvas manufacturer, but had no authority to sell any yarn. On one occasion Hornby sent his servants to the warehouse of the prosecutor to bring away yarn, and W. G. delivered with the yarn an invoice made out in the name of the prosecutor. Subsequently, Hornby sent two of his men to the warehouse of the prosecutor, and, on arriving, they found Hornby and W. G. there. Some yarn was pointed out as the yarn which they were to take to Hornby's premises; and they thereupon, in the presence of Hornby and W. G., carried away the yarn in question. When Hornby was charged he produced the invoice which W. G. gave him on the first occasion, and stated that, except on that occasion, he had had no dealings with him. It was submitted that Hornby was only guilty of receiving the yarn, knowing it to have been stolen; but Coltman, J., held that if Hornby knew that in the transaction in question W. G. was, in fact, committing a felony, he, as well as W. G., was guilty of the same felony; and, therefore, the question for the jury was whether, at the time of the pretended sale by W. G., Hornby knew that W. G. was exceeding his authority and defrauding his master? (o)

Aiding a servant in stealing his master's goods.

Going towards the place where a felony is to be committed, in order to assist in carrying off the property, and assisting accordingly, will not make the party a principal if he was at such a distance, at the time of the felonious taking as not to be able to assist in it. The prisoner and J. S. went to steal two horses; J. S. left the prisoner half a mile from the place in which the horses were, and brought the horses to him, and both rode away with them. Upon a case reserved, the judges thought the prisoner an accessory only, not a principal, because he was not present at the original taking. (p) So, where a servant let a person into his master's house, in order that he might steal his master's money, and he continued in the house till the robbery, but the servant left the house before the robbery was committed, it was held that the servant was an accessory before the fact. (q) So, where on an indictment for stealing in a dwelling-house, it was proved that a servant had unlocked the door of the house, in order that another person might get in and steal the property, which he did about twenty minutes after the servant had left the house, it was contended that, as it was clear that if the servant had been indicted for house-breaking and stealing, he might have been convicted; (r) that showed that he was guilty of stealing the money, for that could not depend upon the form of the indictment. But it was held that the servant was only an accessory before the fact to the offence charged in this indictment. (s) So, where three prisoners were jointly indicted for maliciously wounding with intent to maim, &c., and one of them did not come up and take any part until the wound had been inflicted by the others, it was held that the latter only could be convicted, though the former kicked the prosecutor several times after he came up. (t) So, if two prisoners go to a house, intending to commit a theft in it, and one enters first and is apprehended, and then the other enters and commits the theft, the former is only an accessory before the fact. (u)

But where a man committed a larceny, in a room of a house, in which room he lodged, and threw a bundle containing the stolen property out of the window to an accomplice who was waiting to receive it, the judges came to a different conclusion. The accomplice was indicted and convicted as a receiver; and the learned judge before whom he was tried was of opinion, that as the thief stole the property in his own room, and required no assistance to commit the felony, the conviction of the accomplice as a receiver might have been supported, if the jury had found that the thief had brought the goods out of the house, and delivered them to the accomplice; but as the jury had found that the thief threw the things out of the window, and that the accomplice was in waiting to receive them, he thought the point fit for consideration. And the judges were of opinion that the accomplice in this case was a principal, and that the conviction of him as a receiver was wrong. (v)

A principal in the second degree cannot be convicted as a receiver where he receives the goods at the time and place when and where he becomes such principal in the second degree.

So, where on an indictment against George P. for stealing, and Henry P. for receiving pork, it appeared that the prisoners were seen conversing together near the prosecutor's premises, and went together to his warehouse, and George went into the warehouse and took the pork out of a tub, and brought it out of the warehouse and gave it to Henry, who had remained on the outside, and who was not in a position to see what George did in the warehouse, but was sufficiently near to have rendered him aid in case he had been taken into custody; that is to say, the evidence was sufficient to have convicted him as a principal in the second degree; and the jury having found Henry guilty, upon a case reserved upon the question whether a person who was a principal in the second degree could, under the above circumstances, be convicted as a receiver of the goods stolen, the judges were unanimously of opinion that he could not; and, therefore, the conviction of Henry was wrong. (w)

But in order to make a person who is present when a felony is committed a principal in the second degree, there must be a community of purpose with the party actually committing the felony, at the time when the felony is committed. One count charged Hilton and M'Evin with stealing from the person; another charged them with feloniously receiving the stolen property. Hilton was walking by the side of the prosecutrix, and M'Evin was seen just previously following behind her. The prosecutrix felt a tug at her pocket, found her purse was gone, and, on looking round, saw Hilton behind her, walking with M'Evin in the opposite direction, and saw her hand something to M'Evin. The jury were directed that, if they did not think, from the evidence, M'Evin was participating in the actual theft, it was open to them on these facts to find him guilty of receiving. The jury found Hilton guilty of stealing and M'Evin guilty of receiving; and it was held that the direction was right, as to make M'Evin a principal in the second degree there must have been a community of purpose with Hilton in the actual stealing. (x)

There must be a community of purpose at the time the felony is committed.

When an offence is committed through the medium of an innocent agent, the employer, though absent when the act is done, is answerable as a principal. Thus, if a child under years of discretion, a madman, or any other person of defective mind, is incited to commit a murder or other crime, the inciter is the principal ex necessitate, though he were absent when the thing was done. (y) Where, therefore, on an indictment for larceny it appeared that the prisoner had induced a child of the age of nine years to take money from his father's till and give it him, Wightman, J., left it to the jury to say whether the child was an innocent agent, that is, whether he knew that he was doing wrong, or was acting altogether unconsciously of guilt and at the dictation of the prisoner. (z) And if a man give another a forged note that the other may utter it, if the latter be ignorant of the note being forged, the uttering by the latter is the uttering of the former, though the former were absent at the time of the actual uttering. (a) But if the person who received the note knew that it was forged, the person who gave it would not be punishable as a principal. (b) For where a person having incited another to lay poison, is absent at the time of laying it, he is an accessory only, though he prepared the poison, if the person laying it is amenable as a principal; but is punishable as a principal if the person laying the poison is not so amenable. (c)

Where an offence is committed by means of an innocent agent the party employing the agent is the principal.

no doubt that he might be convicted as a receiver. C. S. G.

clubs. One die was to be exactly like the obverse side of a shilling, another with an inscription, a third exactly like the reverse side of a shilling, and the fourth with an inscription; and before making them, the die-sinker communicated with the officers of the Mint, who directed him to execute the prisoner's order, which he did by making the first and third dies, and from these counterfeit shillings could be coined; it was held that the prisoner was the principal felon, as the die-sinker was an innocent agent. (d) So, where the prisoners had applied to an artist to engrave a copy of the coupons of the Netherlands Bank, and the artist, suspecting that there was an intention to defraud, communicated with the Dutch consul, and under his direction, employed persons to engrave the plate in pursuance of the orders given him; it was held that the authority given was better than the one held sufficient in the preceding case, and that the artist was an innocent agent. (e)

Where poison is laid for a man, and all who were present and concurred in laying it are absent at the time it is taken by the party killed by taking it, all are principals; otherwise all would escape punishment. (f)

Where an innocent agent is employed to engrave a plate by one of several persons engaged in a forgery in the absence of the others, the latter are all principals.

Bull in London, and Schmidt on the Continent, were engaged in planning the forgery of a plate, as appeared by letters which had passed between them. The order for the plate was, however, given by Bull to an innocent agent before Schmidt came to England. On his arrival he and Bull went to the manufacturer, and the plate was given to them. It was contended that Bull was the principal, and that Schmidt was only an accessory before the fact. That it was precisely the same as if Bull had engraved the plate, and, if so, Schmidt was only an accessory. Tindal, C. J.: 'That reasoning would be good if the actual maker had been a guilty party, because he would stand in a different position to those who had counselled him to the commission of the crime. But it altogether fails where the immediate agent is an innocent one. Then, those who have plotted and arranged that he should do the particular act are themselves principals. Suppose the prisoners had been both abroad, and that, having planned the forgery, one of them had given the order for the plate by letter, can it be doubted that they would be indictable as principals; and can it make any difference that one of them is in this country? It seems to me, then, that the circumstance of the immediate agent in this forgery being an innocent person renders the rule of law as to principal and accessory inapplicable.' Alderson, B.: 'If a person does an act of this kind, with a guilty intent, he is not the agent of any one. If he does it innocently, he is the agent of some person or persons; and if two have agreed to employ him, he is the agent of both. In this case, therefore, it is a question for the jury whether the prisoners were jointly acting in procuring this plate to be made. If they were, then the engraver acts on behalf of both. It makes no difference whether they were in England or elsewhere; when they have once agreed to do the thing, the act of one is the act of all, although the rest be absent at the time.' (g)

It has been held, that to aid and assist a person to the jurors unknown to obtain money by the practice of ring-dropping is felony, if the jury find that the prisoner was confederating with the person unknown to obtain the money by means of this practice. (g) And if several act in concert to steal a man's goods, and he is induced by fraud to trust one of them in the presence of the others with the possession of the goods, and then another of the party entice the owner away, in order that the party who has obtained such possession may carry the goods off, all will be guilty of felony, the receipt by one, under such circumstances, being a felonious taking by all. (h) So, where a prisoner asked a servant, who had no authority to sell, the price of a mare, and desired him to trot her out, and then went to two men, and having talked to them, went away, and the two men then came up and induced the servant to exchange the mare for a horse of little value, it was held that if the prisoner was in league with the two men to obtain the mare by fraud and steal her he was a principal. [29]

If a fact amounting to murder should be committed in prosecution of some unlawful purpose, though it were but a bare trespass, all persons who had gone in order to give assistance, if need were, for carrying such unlawful purpose into execution, would be guilty of murder. But this will apply only to a case where the murder was committed in prosecution of some unlawful purpose, some common design in which the combining parties were united, and for the effecting whereof they had assembled; for unless this shall appear, though the person giving the mortal blow may himself be guilty of murder, or manslaughter, yet the others who came together for a different purpose will not be involved in his guilt. (h) Thus where three soldiers went together to rob an orchard; two got upon a pear-tree, and the third stood at the gate with a drawn sword in his hand; and the owner's son coming by collared the man at the gate, and asked him what business he had there, whereupon the soldier stabbed him; it was ruled to be murder in the man who stabbed, but that those on the tree were innocent. It was considered that they came to commit a small inconsiderable trespass, and that the man was killed upon a sudden affray without their knowledge. But the decision would have been otherwise if they had all come thither with a general resolution against all opposers; for then the murder would have been committed in prosecution of their original purpose. The question was, whether this was felony in all; and Holt, C. J., citing the case, says, 'That they were all engaged in an unlawful act is plain, for they could not justify breaking

Where on a trial for murder the case on the part of the Crown was, that the prisoner and Jackson had followed the deceased for the purpose of robbing him, and that, in pursuance of that object, one or both of them struck the deceased on the head and killed him, and the preceding passage was cited for the prisoner; Bramwell, B., told the jury, 'The rule of law is this: if two persons are engaged in the pursuit of an unlawful object, the two having the same object in view, and, in the pursuit of that common object, one of them does an act which is the cause of death under such circumstances that it amounts to murder in him, it amounts to murder in the other also. The cases which have been referred to may be explained in this way. The object for which the parties went out was a comparatively trifling one, and it is almost impossible to suppose that if one had committed a murder whilst engaged in the pursuit of such an object, the act could have been done in furtherance of the common object they had in view, which was comparatively so unimportant.' 'Suppose two men go out together, and one of them holds a third man for the purpose of enabling his companion to cut that man's throat, and his companion does so, no one could doubt that they were both equally guilty of murder. Therefore, if you find the common unlawful object in the two prisoners, and death ensuing from the act of Jackson in pursuance of that common unlawful object, under such circumstances that it was murder in him, it is your duty to find the prisoner guilty.' (m)

Or where there is a general resolution against all opposers.

For where there is a general resolution against all opposers, whether such resolution appears upon evidence to have been actually and explicitly entered into by the confederates, or may be reasonably collected from their number, arms, or behaviour, at or before the scene of action, and homicide is committed by any of the party, every person present in the sense of the law when the homicide is committed will be involved in the guilt of him that gave the mortal blow. (n) Thus where several persons are together for the purpose of committing a breach of the peace, assaulting persons who pass, and, while acting together in that common object, a fatal blow is given, it is immaterial which struck the blow, for the blow given under such circumstances is in point of law the blow of all, and it is unnecessary to prove which struck the blow. (o)

But where the purpose was lawful, it will be murder only in the party killing and his actual aiders and abettors.

But it must be observed that this doctrine respecting the whole party being involved in the guilt of one or more, will apply only to such assemblies as are formed for carrying some common purpose, unlawful in itself, into execution. For if the original intention was lawful, and prosecuted by lawful means, and opposition is made by others, and one of the opposing party is killed in the struggle, in that case the person actually killing may be guilty of murder or manslaughter, as circumstances may vary the case: but the persons engaged with him will not be involved in a man's house without making a demand first; yet all those who were not guilty of the stealing were acquitted, notwithstanding their being engaged in one unlawful act of breaking the door; for this reason, because they knew not of any such intent, but it was a chance opportunity of stealing, whereupon some of them did lay hands.'

his guilt, unless they actually aided and abetted him in the fact; for they assembled for another purpose which was lawful, and consequently the guilt of the person actually killing cannot by any fiction of law be carried against them beyond their original intention. (p)

When several are present and abet a fact, an indictment may lay it generally as done by all, or specially, as done by one and abetted by the rest. (q) And even in offences in which there could have been only one principal in the first degree, as in rape, a charge against all as principals in the first degree is valid, if there be no difference in the punishment between the principals in the first and those in the second degree; though it should seem that the more correct form in a case of this kind would be to charge the parties according to the facts as they will be proved. (r)

and abettors.

An indictment against the principal in the second degree in murder should show distinctly that he was present when the mortal stroke was given; and it should seem that it would not be sufficient to state that both of their malice aforethought made the assault; that the principal in the first degree then and there gave the mortal stroke, and so that both murdered; at least it would not be sufficient if, before the allegation that both murdered, it is stated that the one (the principal in the second degree) counselled and incited the other to do the act. (s)

III. An accessory before the fact is he who, being absent at the time of the offence committed, doth yet procure, counsel, command or abet another to commit a felony. (t) And it seems that those who by hire, command, counsel, or conspiracy, and those who by showing an express liking, approbation, or assent to another's felonious design of committing a felony, abet and encourage him to commit it, but are so far absent when he actually commits it that he could not be encouraged by the hopes of any immediate help or assistance from them, are accessories before the fact. (u) But words that amount to bare permission will not make an accessory, as if A. says he will kill J. S., and B. says 'you may do your pleasure for me,' this will not make B. an accessory. (v) And it seems to be generally agreed that he who barely conceals a felony which he knows to be intended is guilty only of misprision of felony, and shall not be adjudged an accessory. (w) The same person may be a principal and an accessory in the same felony, as where A. commands B. to kill C., and afterwards actually joins with him in the fact. (x)

The offence of an accessory before the fact differs so much from that of a principal in the second degree, that where a person was indicted as an accessory before the fact, it was held that she could not be convicted of that charge upon evidence proving her to have been present aiding and abetting; it being clearly admitted to be

But as a great majority of the judges were of opinion that, as Danelly acted in order to detect the other prisoner, he was free from any felonious intent, and therefore the charge against Vaughan, as accessory, of course could not be supported. (z)

Description of accessories before the fact in different statutes.

It is to be observed, that the Legislature, in statutes made from time to time concerning accessories before the fact, has not confined itself to any certain mode of expression; but has rather chosen to make use of a variety of words all terminating in the same general idea. Thus some statutes make use of the word accessories, singly, without any words descriptive of the offence; (a) others have the words abetment, procurement, helping, maintaining, and counselling; (b) or aiders, abettors, procurers, and counsellors. (c) One describes the offence by the words command, counsel, or hire; (d) another calls the offenders procurers or accessories. (e) One having made use of the words comfort, aid, abet, assist, counsel, hire, or command, immediately afterwards, in describing the same offence in another case, uses the words counsel, hire, or command only. (f) One statute calls them counsellors and contrivers of felonies; (g) and many others make use of the terms counsellors, aiders, and abettors, or barely aiders and abettors. Upon these different modes of expression, all plainly descriptive of the same offence, Mr. J. Foster thinks it may safely be concluded that in the construction of statutes we are not to be governed by the bare sound, but by the true legal import of the words; and that every person who comes within the description of these statutes, various as they are in point of expression, is in the judgment of the Legislature an accessory before the fact; unless he is present at the fact, and in that case he is undoubtedly a principal. (h)

principal and accessory in the same indictment; but this was not allowed, Rex v. Madden, R. & M., C. C. R. 277; Rex v. Galloway, ibid. 234, until the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46. Whoever procures a felony to be committed, though it be by the intervention of a third person, is an accessory before the fact; for there is nothing in the notion of commanding, hiring, counselling, aiding, or abetting, which may not be effected by the intervention of a third person without any direct immediate connection between the first mover and the actor. It is a principle in law which can never be controverted, that he who procures a felony to be done is a felon. So that if A. bid his servant to hire somebody, no matter whom, to murder B. and furnish him with money for that purpose, and the servant procure C., a person whom A. never saw nor heard of to do it, A., who is manifestly the first mover or contriver of the murder, is an accessory before the fact.⁽ⁱ⁾ And a nobleman was found guilty of murder, by his peers, upon evidence which satisfied them that he had contributed to the murder, by the intervention of his lady and of two other persons who were themselves no more than accessories, without any sort of proof that he had ever conversed with the person who was the only principal in the murder, or had corresponded with him directly by letter or message.^(k) For with respect to an accessory before the fact, it is not necessary that there should be any direct communication between the accessory and the principal. It is enough if the accessory direct an intermediate agent to procure another to commit a felony: and it will be sufficient, even though the accessory does not name the person to be procured, but merely directs the agent to employ some person.^(l)

He who procures a felony is a felon.

In high treason there are no accessories, but all are principals, on account of the heinousness of the crime.^(m) But in murder, and felonies in general, there may be accessories, except only in those offences which by judgment of law are sudden and unpremeditated; such are some cases of manslaughter and the like, where there cannot be any accessories before the fact.⁽ⁿ⁾ But there are other cases of manslaughter where there may be accessories before the fact. swallowing sulphate of potash for the purpose of procuring abortion, she believing herself to be pregnant, although in reality she was not. The prisoner purchased the sulphate of potash, and gave it to his wife in order that she might swallow it for the above-mentioned purpose, but he was absent at the time when she swallowed it. For the prosecution, it was contended that the wife committed a felony in swallowing the sulphate of potash, and as death ensued therefrom, she also committed murder; (o) that the prisoner was an accessory before the fact to this felony, and to the consequent murder, and might be tried under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, and that, although the evidence showed his offence was murder, yet that would support an indictment for manslaughter. For the prisoner it was contended that there could not be an accessory before the fact in manslaughter; but it was held, upon the facts of this case, that the prisoner might be convicted of manslaughter. (p)

Who are principals in forgery.

In forgery it is laid down generally in the books that all are principals, and that whatever would make a man accessory before in felony would make him a principal in forgery; (q) but it is conceived that this must be understood of forgery at common law, and where it is considered only as a misdemeanor. (r)

If several execute distinct parts of a forged instrument in pursuance of a common design they are all principals, though they are not together when it is completed.

If several combine to forge an instrument, and each executes by himself a distinct part of the forgery, they are all principals, though they are not together when the instrument is completed. On an indictment for forgery against Bingley, Dutton, and Batkin, it appeared that Bingley and Dutton bought the paper, and cut it into pieces of the proper size at their house; it was then taken to Batkin, who struck off in blank all the printed part of the note except the date line and the number, and impressed on the paper the wavy horizontal lines. The blanks were then brought back to the house of Bingley and Dutton, where the water-mark was introduced into the paper; after which Bingley, in the presence of Dutton, impressed the date line and number, and Dutton added the signature. It did not appear that Batkin was present at this time. The jury found that all three concurred and co-operated in the design and execution of the forgery, each taking his own part, and that Bingley and Dutton acted together in completing the notes. The judges were of opinion that, as each of the prisoners acted in completing some part of the forgery, and in pursuance of the common plan, each was a principal in the forgery; and that although Batkin was not present when the note was completed by the signature, he was equally guilty with the others. a principal, though he does not know by whom the other parts are executed, and though it is finished by one alone in the absence of the others. (t) On an indictment against Dade, Kirkwood, and Stansfield, for forging a note, and against Collins and Campbell as accessories before the fact, it appeared that Stansfield made the paper, Kirkwood engraved the plate, and struck off the impression; and Dade, in the absence of Stansfield and Kirkwood, filled up and finished the note. Stansfield, when he made the paper, did not know that Kirkwood or Dade were to have anything to do with the forgery; nor did Kirkwood know, when he engraved the plate and made the impression, that Dade or Stansfield were, or were to be, concerned. Collins and Campbell were the movers, and through them all the parties were set to work. Dade was not upon his trial, and Collins and Campbell could not properly be tried, unless Stansfield and Kirkwood were to be deemed principals. The judges were unanimous that Kirkwood and Stansfield were principals, and that the ignorance of Stansfield and Kirkwood of those who were to effect the other parts of the forgery was immaterial: it was sufficient if they knew it was to be effected by somebody. (u) There was another indictment against Dade and Kirkwood for forgery, and against Collyer and Calvert as accessories before the fact. Kirkwood engraved the plate, and worked off the impression from it, and Dade, in his absence, filled up the notes; Dade was not on his trial. It was held, that Kirkwood was a principal. (v)

It follows, from the two last cases, that those who procure and cause an instrument to be forged, but execute no part of the forgery, and are not present when it is executed, are accessories before the fact, and not principals.

of stolen goods, are in some instances punished with more severity than the principal offenders. (a)

How far an accessory is implicated when the principal varies from the terms of the instigation.

It has been occasionally much considered how far an accessory is involved in the guilt of the principal when the principal does not act in conformity with the plans and instructions of the accessory. With regard to this, it appears that if the principal totally and substantially varies from the terms of the instigation, if being solicited to commit a felony of one kind, he wilfully and knowingly commit a felony of another, he will stand single in that offence, and the person soliciting will not be involved in his guilt. (b) Thus if A. command B. to burn C.'s house, and he in so doing commits a robbery; now A., though accessory to the burning, is not accessory to the robbery, for that is a thing of a distinct and unconsequential nature. (c) And if A. counsels B. to steal goods of C. on the road, and B. breaks into C.'s house and steals them there, A. is not accessory to the breaking the house, because that is a felony of another kind. (d) He is however accessory to the stealing. (e) But if the principal complies in substance with the instigation of the accessory, varying only in circumstances of time or place, or in the manner of execution, the accessory will be involved in his guilt: as if A. command B. to murder C. by poison, and B. does it by a sword or other weapon, or by any other means, A. is accessory to this murder; for the murder of C. was the object principally in contemplation, and that is effected. (f) And it seems that if A. counsels B. to steal goods in C.'s house, but not to break into it, and B. does break into it, A. is accessory to the breaking. (g) And where the principal goes beyond the terms of the solicitation, yet if, in the event, the felony committed was a probable consequence of what was ordered or advised, the person giving such orders or advice will be an accessory to that felony. As if A. advise B. to rob C., and in robbing him B. kills him, either upon resistance made, or to conceal the fact, or upon any other motive operating at the time of the robbery: or if A. solicit B. to burn the house of C., and B. does it accordingly, and the flames taking hold of the house of D., that likewise is burnt: in these cases A. is accessory to B. both in the murder of C. and in the burning of the house of D. The advice, solicitation, or orders, were pursued in substance, and were extremely flagitious on the part of A.: and the events, though possibly falling out beyond his original intention, were, in the ordinary course of things, the probable consequences of what B. did under the influence and at the instigation of A. (h)

Counselling a pregnant woman to murder her child.

But more difficult questions arise where the principal by mistake commits a different crime from that to which he was solicited by the accessory. It has been said, that if A. orders B. to kill C., and he by mistake kills D., or aiming a blow at C. misses him and kills D., A. will not be accessory to this murder, because it differs in the person. (k) And in support of this position Saunders' case (l) is cited; who, with the intention of destroying his wife, by the advice of one Archer, mixed poison in a roasted apple, and gave it her to eat; and the wife having eaten a small part of it, and having given the remainder to their child, Saunders (making only a faint attempt to save the child whom he loved, and would not have destroyed) stood by and saw it eat the poison, of which it soon afterwards died. And it was held, that though Saunders was clearly guilty of the murder of the child, yet Archer was not accessory to that murder. But Mr. J. Foster thinks that this case of Saunders does not support the position (which he calls a merciful opinion) to its full extent; and he proposes the following case as worthy of consideration:—‘B. is an utter stranger to the person of C.; A. therefore takes upon him to describe him by his stature, dress, age, complexion, &c., and acquaints B. when and where he may probably be met with. B. is punctual at the time and place; and D., a person possibly in the opinion of B. answering the description, unhappily comes by and is murdered, upon a strong belief on the part of B. that this is the man marked out for destruction. Here is a lamentable mistake;—but who is answerable for it? B. undoubtedly is; the malice on his part egreditur personam. And may not the same be said on the part of A.? The pit which he, with a murderous intention, dug for C., D. through his guilt fell into and perished. For B., not knowing the person of C., had no other guide to lead him to his prey than the description A. gave of him. B. in following this guide fell into a mistake, which it is great odds any man in his circumstances might have fallen into. I therefore, as at present advised, conceive that A. was answerable for the consequence of the flagitious orders he gave, since that consequence appears, in the ordinary course of things, to have been highly probable.’ (m)

A. being counselled to murder B. murders C.

Mr. J. Foster then proposes the following criteria, as explaining the grounds upon which the several cases falling under this head will be found to turn:—‘Did the principal commit the felony he stands charged with under the influence of the flagitious advice; and was the event, in the ordinary course of things, a probable consequence of that felony? or did he, following the suggestions of his own wicked heart, wilfully and knowingly commit a felony of another kind, or upon a different subject.’ (n)

Criteria in such cases.

A. commands B. to kill C., but before the execution thereof repents and countermands B., yet B. proceeds in the execution thereof; A. is not accessory, for his consent continues not, and he gave timely countermand to B.: but though A. had repented, yet if B. had not been actually countermanded before the fact committed, A. had been accessory. (o)

Accessory countermands the principal.

felony to have been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the felon. (p) And it seems to have been agreed, that any assistance given to one known to be a felon, in order to hinder his being apprehended or tried, or suffering the punishment to which he is condemned, is a sufficient receipt to make a man an accessory of this description: as where one assists a felon with a horse to ride away, or with money or victuals to support him in his escape, or where one harbours and conceals in his house a felon under pursuit, by reason whereof the pursuers cannot find him; and much more where one harbours in his house and openly protects such a felon, by reason whereof the pursuers dare not take him. (q) If A. has his goods stolen by B., and C. knowing they were stolen receives them, this simply of itself makes not an accessory; but if B. come to C. and deliver him the goods to keep for him, C. knowing that they were stolen, and that B. stole them, or if C. receive the goods to facilitate the escape of B., or if C. knowingly receives them upon agreement to furnish B. with supplies out of them, and accordingly supplies him, this makes C. an accessory. But the bare receiving of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, makes not an accessory; for he may receive them to keep for the true owner, or till they are recovered or restored by law. (r)

Where, after setting out the conviction of a principal for a robbery of a £100 note, an indictment alleged that the prisoner did receive, harbour, maintain, relieve, aid, comfort and assist the principal, knowing him to have committed the robbery, and it appeared that shortly after the robbery the prisoner applied to his landlady to change the note, but did not succeed; and that the principal went to a shop to purchase some articles, for the payment of which he tendered the note, and received a large part of it in change, and that during the time he was in the shop the prisoner was waiting outside; Maule, J., held that there was evidence of comforting and assisting. If a man stole a horse, and another assisted him in colouring and disguising him, so that he could not be known again, that would make him an accessory. Here the prisoner assists the party who has stolen the note to get rid of it, and thus evade the justice of the country. (s)

(t) So a man who employs another person to harbour the principal may be convicted as an accessory after the fact, although he himself did no act of relieving or assisting the principal. (u)

Also, whoever rescues a felon from an arrest for the felony, or voluntarily and intentionally suffers him to escape, is an accessory to the felony: (v) and it has been said, that those are in like manner guilty who oppose the apprehending of a felon. (w) It is agreed by all the books, that a man may be an accessory after the fact by receiving one who was an accessory before, as well as by receiving a principal. (x) And it has been holden, that a man may make himself an accessory after the fact to a larceny of his own goods, or to a robbery on himself, by harbouring or concealing the thief, or assisting in his escape. (y)

In order to support a charge of receiving, harbouring, comforting, assisting and maintaining a felon, there must be some act proved to have been done to assist the felon personally; it is not enough to prove possession of various sums of money derived from the disposal of the property stolen. (z)

Where an indictment alleged that Mills sent letters demanding money with menaces, and that the prisoner did 'feloniously receive, harbour, maintain, and assist' the said Mills, knowing her to have committed the said felony, and the letters contained threats of exposing the immorality of the prosecutor, and one of them threatened to insert a paragraph in the 'Satirist'; and immediately afterwards articles reflecting on the prosecutor appeared in that paper, of which the prisoner was the proprietor, and on being cautioned as to the course he was pursuing, the prisoner said he could not stop the publication of such articles in future, and referred to Mills, and gave her address, and on being told that the prosecutor would submit to a little extortion rather than have his character assailed, the prisoner consented to wait a week that the prosecutor might be spoken to on the subject. Notices, however, that further articles of the same nature would be published continued to appear in the 'Satirist.' It was contended that there was no evidence to prove that the prisoner was an accessory; it was answered that any assistance given to the principal to enable her to carry out the object with which the felony was committed was sufficient. Erle, J.: 'I do not agree to that proposition; the assistance must tend to prevent the principal felon from being brought to justice. The question is, did he, after the felony was complete, assist the felon to elude justice? It is no part of this felony that the money should be paid: the crime is complete as soon as the demand is made. Can it be said, then, that by assisting in a fresh attempt to obtain money, he aided her in concealing or even carrying out the one completed.' Erle, J., however left the case to the jury, intending to reserve the point; but the jury acquitted the prisoner. after. (b) It has, however, been said, that if the Act of Parliament that makes the felony in express terms, comprehend accessories before, and make no mention of accessories after, it seems there can be no accessories after; the expression of procurers, counsellors, abettors, all which import accessories before, making it evident that the Legislature did not intend to include accessories after, whose offence is of a lower degree than that of accessories before. (c) But by others it is considered to be settled law, that in all cases where a statute makes any offence treason, or felony, it involves the receiver of the offender in the same guilt with himself, in the same manner as in treason or felony at common law, unless there be an express provision to the contrary. (d) And although it be generally true, that an Act of Parliament creating a felony renders consequentially accessories before and after within the same penalty, yet the special penning of the Act sometimes varies the case: thus the 3 Hen. 7, c. 2 (now repealed), for taking away women, made the taking away, the procuring and abetting, and also the wittingly receiving, all equally felonies and excluded from clergy. So that Acts of Parliament may diversify the offences of accessory or principal according to their various penning, and have done so in many cases. (e)

The accessory must know of the felony committed, and the felony must be complete.

There is no doubt but that it is necessary for a receiver to have had notice, either express or implied, of the felony having been committed, in order to make him an accessory by receiving the felon; (f) and it is also agreed, that the felony must be complete at the time of the assistance given, else it makes not the assistant an accessory. So that if one wound another mortally, and after the wound given, but before death ensues, a person assists or receives the delinquent; this does not make him accessory to the homicide, for till death ensues there is no felony committed. (g)

The law has such a regard to the duty, love, and tenderness, which a wife owes to her husband, that it does not make her an accessory to felony by any receipt whatever which she may give to him; considering that she ought not to discover her husband. (h)

Prosecutions against accessories after the fact at common law not frequent.

It is not thought necessary to discuss further the general principles of law relating to accessories after the fact, since prosecutions against such persons grounded on the common law are seldom instituted at the present time; nor do they appear to have been frequent for many years past, nor to have had any great effect. (i) It should seem, however, that the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, ss. 8, 9 will apply to accessories after the fact, where no punishment is specially provided for their felony. (k) The Consolidation Acts of the 24 & 25 Vict. make accessories after the fact to felonies punishable under those Acts respectively liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years. (l)

The principal and accessory may be indicted in the same indictment, and tried together, which is the best and most usual course. Formerly the accessory could not, without his own consent, have been brought to trial till the guilt of the principal was legally ascertained by conviction or outlawry, unless they were tried together. (l) And an accessory could not in such case have been tried, unless the principal had been attained, so that if the principal stood mute of malice, or challenged peremptorily above the legal number of jurors, or refused to answer directly to the charge, the accessory could not have been put upon his trial. (m) But the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, which came into operation on Nov. 1, 1861, has made the following salutary provisions for the effectual prosecution of accessories.

Of the proceedings against accessories.

‘As to accessories before the fact:

Sec. 1. ‘Whosoever shall become an accessory before the fact to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, may be indicted, tried, convicted, and punished in all respects as if he were a principal felon.’

Accessories before the fact may be tried and punished as principals.

This clause is taken from the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, upon which it was held, that it was no objection to an accessory before the fact being convicted that his principal had been acquitted. Hall and Hughes were jointly indicted for stealing certain cotton. Hall was acquitted and called as a witness against Hughes; and it clearly appeared that Hall had stolen the cotton at the instigation of Hughes, and in his absence. It was contended, that as Hall had been acquitted, Hughes must be so also; for the statute had only altered the form of pleading, and not the law, as to accessories before the fact; but it was held, that the statute had made the offence of the accessory before the fact a substantive felony, and that the old law, which made the conviction of the principal a condition precedent to the conviction of the accessory, was done away by that enactment. (n)

Notwithstanding the acquittal of the principal, the accessory may be tried under this clause.

In every case where there may be a doubt whether a person be a principal or accessory before the fact, it may be advisable to prefer the indictment under this section, as such an indictment will be sufficient, whether it turn out on the evidence that such person was a principal or accessory before the fact, as well as where it is clear that he was either the one or the other, but it is uncertain which he was.

Where an indictment may be framed under this section.

It may be well to observe, however, that there are cases in which it is not clear that an indictment under this section would suffice. Suppose, for instance, that the offence of the principal be local; e. g., a burglary committed in the county of Worcester, and that the accessory is indicted in the county of Stafford on the ground that the evidence shows that the acts, by which he became accessory, were done in the latter county, it may be questionable whether the accessory could be indicted and tried under this section in that county; for it only authorises the accessory to be indicted and tried 'as if he were a principal felon,' and the principal could only be indicted and tried in Worcestershire. Possibly if such an objection were taken on the trial, it might be held that sec. 7 of this Act authorised the indictment and trial in Staffordshire, on the ground that the evidence showed the party to have become an accessory before the fact in that county. But supposing that to be so, the same question might be raised in arrest of judgment or on error, and on the face of the record all that would appear would be that the prisoner was indicted and tried as a principal in Staffordshire for a burglary committed in Worcestershire; but even here it might be held that the effect of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1, is to make every indictment which charges a person as principal contain a charge of being accessory before the fact also, and consequently that there was nothing on the face of the record inconsistent with the facts having proved that the prisoner was such an accessory in Staffordshire. However, in any such case, it would be prudent to insert a count framed under the next section.

The section includes accessories in murder.

In Reg. v. Chadwick, (o) the prisoner was indicted as a principal for murder by arsenic, and the jury found that he procured the arsenic, and caused it to be administered by another person, but was absent when it was administered; and thereupon it was objected that the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, did not apply to murder; but Williams, J., overruled the objection; and having given the matter full consideration, refused to reserve the point. And this decision was clearly right; for it has been held that a commission to the ordinary to receive all clerks indicted for felony, but not for murder, gave authority to the ordinary to receive a person indicted for murder; and all the justices said that murder is felony, and if a commission be made to two to enquire of all felonies, they can well take indictments of murder, although a pardon of all felonies is not available for one indicted of murder; for that is by statute 13 R. 2, st. 2, c. 1. (p)

Accessories before the fact may be indicted as such, or as substantive felons.

Sec. 2. 'Whosoever shall counsel, procure, or command any other person to commit any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, shall be guilty of felony, and may be indicted and convicted either as an accessory before the fact to the principal felony, together with the principal felon, or after the conviction of the principal felon, or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony whether the principal felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted, or shall or shall not be amenable to justice, and may thereupon be punished in the same manner as any accessory before the fact to the same felony, if convicted as an accessory, may be punished.' (q)

Upon an indictment against a prisoner as a principal he cannot be convicted under this section as an accessory after the fact. The prisoner was indicted for stealing from the person; there was no evidence to prove that charge, but there was ample evidence to prove that he was an accessory after the fact to the stealing from the person; it was held that he could not be convicted as such accessory upon this indictment. (s) Reg. v. Fallon, 1 L. & C. 217.

(t) This clause is taken from the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 11, and 9 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 25 (1).

(u) This clause is framed from the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 15, and the words in italics inserted. The Committee of the Commons who sat on the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, struck out those words, not perceiving that they were the only important words in the clause: for there never was any doubt that separate accessories and receivers might be included in the same indictment under the circumstances referred to in the clause; the doubt was, whether they could be compelled to be tried together in the absence of the principal where they separately became accessories, or separately received.

The marginal note was erroneously altered after the Bill went to the House of Lords. It began 'separate accessories,' because the clause applies only to accessories at different times. 'Several' persons may become accessories at one and the same time and place.

an accessory either before or after the fact to any such felony may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished by any court which shall have jurisdiction to try the principal felony, or any felonies committed in any county or place in which the act, by reason whereof such person shall have become such accessory, shall have been committed: and in every other case the offence of any person who shall be an accessory either before or after the fact to any felony may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished by any court which shall have jurisdiction to try the principal felony or any felonies committed in any county or place in which such person shall be apprehended or be in custody, whether the principal felony shall have been committed on the sea or on the land, or begun on the sea and completed on the land, or begun on the land and completed on the sea, and whether within Her Majesty's dominions or without, or partly within Her Majesty's dominions and partly without; provided that no person who shall be once duly tried either as an accessory before or after the fact, or for a substantive felony under the provisions hereinbefore contained, shall be liable to be afterwards prosecuted for the same offence.'

This clause is taken from the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, ss. 9, 10; 9 Geo. 4, c. 54, ss. 23, 24 (I.); and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 2.

Under those enactments accessories might be tried by any court which had jurisdiction to try the principal, although the principal felony had been committed on the sea or on land, whether within the Queen's dominions or without, and where the principal felony was committed in one county, and the act by which the person became an accessory was done in another county, the accessory might be tried in either.

By the earlier part of this clause, where the principal felony is wholly committed in England or Ireland, the accessory may be tried either in the county where the principal felony may be tried, or in the county where the act by which he became an accessory was done. But where the principal felony is not committed wholly in England or Ireland, the accessory may be tried by any court which has jurisdiction to try the principal, or in any county, in which the accessory may be apprehended or be in custody. The object of this latter provision is to meet cases where the principal felony may have been committed, either on land or sea, out of England and Ireland; in such cases no court had jurisdiction to try the principal until he was apprehended in England or Ireland, and consequently where the principal in such cases had not been apprehended, the accessory would not have been triable at all under the former enactments. The words in italics cure this defect.

'As to abettors in misdemeanors:

Abettors in misdemeanors.

Sec. 8. 'Whosoever shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of any misdemeanor, whether the same be a misdemeanor at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, shall be liable to be tried, indicted, and punished as a principal offender.'

This clause is framed from the similar clauses in the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 26; 9 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 33 (I.), &c., and is really only a declaration of the common law on the subject; by which all persons, who would be accessories in felony, are principals in misdemeanor, (uu) and hence it follows that a person indicted for committing a misdemeanor may be convicted, if it appear that he caused it to be committed, although he is absent when it is committed. (v)

‘As to other matters:

Sec. 9. ‘Where any person shall, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England or Ireland, become an accessory to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, and whether such felony shall be committed within that jurisdiction or elsewhere, or shall be begun within that jurisdiction and completed elsewhere, or shall be begun elsewhere and completed within that jurisdiction, the offence of such person shall be felony; and in any indictment for any such offence the venue in the margin shall be the same as if the offence had been committed in the county or place in which such person shall be indicted, and his offence shall be averred to have been committed ‘on the high seas;’ provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect any of the laws relating to the government of Her Majesty’s land or naval forces.’

As to offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty.

The object of the earlier part of this clause is to remove a doubt whether a person who became an accessory on the sea in the cases mentioned in it, was a felon; it may be that this was an unfounded doubt, but it was thought better to prevent the question arising. The 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 9, contained a similar enactment.

The latter part of the clause is framed on the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2, and provides for the form of indictment against accessories on the sea. (w)

An accessory before the fact to the crime of self-murder was not triable at common law, because the principal could not be tried; and such an accessory was not triable under the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 9 (now repealed), which did not make accessories triable except in cases where they might have been tried before. Russell was tried on an indictment which charged S. Wormsley with murdering herself with arsenic, and Russell with inciting her to commit the said murder. It appeared that Wormsley, who was about four months advanced in pregnancy, but not quick with child, died from taking arsenic, which she had received from Russell, for the purpose of procuring a miscarriage, and that she knowingly took it with intent to procure a miscarriage, in the absence of Russell. It was objected that there was no evidence to prove that she was felo de se; that the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 13, did not apply to a woman administering poison to herself, and that assuming her to have taken arsenic knowingly, and with intent to procure miscarriage, she was not guilty of any offence; and, consequently, if there were no principal there could be no accessory. Secondly, that the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 9, did not apply to the case of a principal who was felo de se. It was held that she was felo de se; that Russell was an accessory before the fact, but that he could not be tried as an accessory under the 7 Geo. 4,

c. 64, s. 9, as he could not have been tried at all before that statute, which was to be considered as extending to those persons only, who, before the statute, were triable either with or after the principal, and not to make those triable who before could never have been tried. (x)

Supplying drugs to a pregnant woman, but not causing her to take them.

On a trial for murder, it appeared that the deceased had died from the effects of corrosive sublimate taken to procure abortion, in July 1861. She had endeavoured to purchase corrosive sublimate herself, but the druggists having refused to furnish it to her, she had urged the prisoner to procure it, which he did with the full knowledge of the purpose to which it was to be applied; but there was ground for believing that the prisoner, in procuring the poison, had acted under the influence of threats by the deceased of self-destruction if the means of procuring abortion were not supplied to her. She was a married woman, living separately from her husband, and pregnant by the prisoner. The jury expressly negatived the fact of the prisoner having administered the poison to, or caused it to be taken by, the deceased. They found that the prisoner procured the poison, and delivered it to the deceased, with a knowledge of the purpose to which she intended to apply it, and that he was, therefore, accessory before the fact of her taking poison to procure abortion. Cockburn, C. J., thereupon, on the authority of the preceding case, directed the jury to return a verdict of guilty; but it appearing doubtful to him how far the ruling in that case, that if poison be taken by a woman to produce abortion, and death ensues, she is felo de se, could be upheld; and still more so, how far a man, accessory to the misdemeanor of a woman taking poison to procure abortion, can be held to be accessory to her self-murder, if, contrary to the intention of the parties, death should be the consequence, his Lordship reserved these points: and it was held that the conviction was wrong. That there was a very marked distinction between the two cases. In the one the prisoner persuaded the woman to take the arsenic; in the other the prisoner was unwilling that the woman should take the poison. The facts of the case were quite consistent with the supposition that he hoped and expected that she would change her mind, and would not resort to it. Then the cases being distinguishable, it was unnecessary to decide whether the woman was felo de se. (y)

Indictment against accessory before the fact.

Where an accessory is indicted alone, before his principal has been convicted, the indictment should be for a substantive felony. An indictment charged Ashmall with feloniously using an instrument with intent to procure a miscarriage, and Tay with procuring Ashmall to commit the said felony. Ashmall did not appear to take his trial, and it was held that Tay was not compellable to plead to this indictment, although he might have been to an indictment for a substantive felony. (z) But where an indictment

(y) Reg. v. Fretwell, 1 L. & C. 161. But now by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 58, any woman taking poison to procure abortion is guilty of felony, which materially alters the character of such cases for the future, and the difficulty as to the trial of the accessory is got rid of by sec. 1 of the 24 & 25 Vic. c. 94. See Reg. v. Gaylor, 1 D. & B. 288, ante p. 60.

stated that Lowe cast away a vessel, and that the prisoner incited him to commit the said felony, it was objected that the indictment was not properly framed as for a substantive offence, under the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 9, but was in the form of an indictment at common law against principal and accessory, and as the principal had not been convicted, and was not on his trial, the accessory could not be tried. But it was held that the description of the offence was not altered by the statute. It might have been put in a different shape, but every allegation in this indictment would have been included in any other. (a) So where Mills was indicted for sending letters demanding money with menaces, and Hansill with receiving, harbouring, &c. Mills, knowing her to have committed the said felony, Erle, J., held that Hansill might be tried before Mills on this indictment under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 2 (now repealed, but re-enacted by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 3), as that clause was only intended to alter the course of trial, and not the mode of describing the offence. (b) But an indictment alleging that a certain evil-disposed person feloniously stole, and that before the said felony was done the prisoner did feloniously incite the said evil-disposed person to commit the said felony, is bad. (c)

Where the proceedings are against the accessory alone for receiving stolen goods, the name of the principal need not be stated. (d) So where the proceedings are against both principal and accessory, the indictment may contain counts for a substantive felony in receiving stolen goods without naming the principal, and upon such an indictment the receiver may be convicted, although the principal be acquitted. (e)

against accessories after the fact.

A count charging a person with being accessory before the fact may be joined with a count charging the same person with being accessory after the fact to the same felony, and the prosecutor cannot be compelled to elect upon which he will proceed, and the party may be found guilty upon both. (f) A case has occurred, in which a party was indicted for receiving stolen goods, and also for receiving, harbouring and comforting the felon, and the prisoner was convicted. (g)

Where a count charged a prisoner with stealing certain cotton, and another count charged him with receiving the property aforesaid, and it was proved that the prisoner had solicited a servant to rob his master; which he did, and took the cotton to the prisoner, in whose possession it was afterwards found, and he stated that he had got it from the servant, and the jury found a general verdict of guilty; it was held, on a case reserved, that the jury might upon this evidence reasonably convict the prisoner as an accessory before the fact upon the count for stealing, under sec. 1 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, and that there was no inconsistency in finding that he was guilty of being an accessory before the fact, and that he received the goods knowing them to have been stolen. (h) But where one count charged the prisoner with stealing sheep, and another with receiving the said sheep knowing them to have been stolen, and the jury found a verdict of guilty on both counts, the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland set aside the verdict and judgment on the ground that this was an inconsistent verdict. The Court assumed that the counts were inserted under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 3, and held that that statute only authorised the jury to convict either of stealing or receiving, and not of both. (i)

An indictment against an accessory should state that the principal committed the offence; and it is not sufficient merely to state, that he was indicted for the offence, as the indictment is only an accusation, and it does not follow that he really committed the offence, because he was indicted for it. (k)

Where an indictment against an accessory after the fact stated, that at a General Session of Oyer and Terminer holden, &c., 'it was presented' that the principal committed a robbery, Maule, J., arrested the judgment, because the indictment did not state by whom the presentment was made. It was possible that it might not be necessary to set out the whole indictment, though that was doubtful. But it certainly ought to be stated by whom the presentment was made. (l)

A man may be arraigned as accessory to such of the principals as are convicted.

Formerly, if a man had been indicted as accessory in the same felony to several persons, he could not have been arraigned till all the principals were convicted and attainted: but it was afterwards settled, that if a man were indicted as accessory to two or more, and the jury found him accessory to one, it was a good verdict, and judgment might pass upon him. (m)

(h) Reg. v. Hughes, Bell C. C. 242.

(i) Reg. v. Evans, 7 Cox C. C. 151. The Court said that 'it might be possible that a man may have stolen goods, and, after disposing of them, may afterwards get them into his hands knowing them to be stolen, and be thus guilty of stealing and receiving the same goods.' Now, suppose, on the trial of this indictment, the facts had been as thus stated, it seems plain that the jury ought to have found the verdict they did, and upon the finding as it stood the Court were bound to presume that the evidence proved both counts. But the Court add, 'the statements in this record negative such a state of facts,' and 'the unity of the offence in the ordinary language is put beyond doubt, the stealing and receiving are of the same chattel, laid as the property of the same person, on the same day.' This is a plain error; the property must be the same, and the time laid is perfectly immaterial; but even if it were material, a man may on the same day steal goods at one place, part with them, and receive them again at another place. Again, the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 3, only says, 'it shall be lawful' for the jury to convict either of stealing or receiving; but it does not forbid them to convict of both. Suppose a written confession of the prisoner proved both offences, how can a jury on their oaths acquit of either? In point of law there never was any objection to the insertion of several distinct felonies in one indictment; it was no ground of demurrer, arrest of judgment or error (1 Chitt. Cr. L. 253), but it was mere matter for the discretion of the judge to put the prosecutor to elect on which charge he would proceed. The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 3, had taken away that discretion in this case, and made a prisoner triable at the same time for stealing and receiving, and as the Act contains no prohibitory words, the necessary consequence follows that the jury may convict of both if the evidence prove both offences. If it were otherwise, they must find a false verdict either on the one or other count, and thereby save the prisoner from the punishment of one of the two offences he had committed. See p. 126, post. C. S. G.

(k) Lord Sanchar's case, 9 Co. 117 a. In Reg. v. Read, 1 Cox C. C. 65, this case was not cited; but Maule, J., expressed an opinion in accordance with it, and would have reserved the point, if the prisoner had been found guilty.

If A. be indicted as principal, and B. as accessory, and both be acquitted, or if B. only be acquitted, yet B. may be indicted as principal in the same offence, and his former acquittal is no bar. (n) So if A. were indicted as principal and acquitted, he might formerly have been afterwards indicted as accessory before the fact. (o) But now an acquittal as principal is clearly a bar to an indictment for being accessory before the fact; for on an indictment as principal an accessory before the fact may be convicted under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1. So if a man be indicted as principal and acquitted, he may be indicted as accessory after the fact; and so if he be indicted as accessory before the fact and acquitted, he may be indicted as accessory after the fact. (p) The late statute, as we have seen, enacts, that no person who shall be once duly tried for any offence of being an accessory shall be liable to be again indicted or tried for the same offence. (q)

Former acquittal, when a bar to a fresh indictment.

The indictment charged all four prisoners with feloniously inciting a certain evil-disposed person to forge a will; the evidence did not show any joint act done by the prisoners, but only separate and independent acts at separate and distinct times and places. After all the evidence on the part of the prosecution had been given, one of the prisoners pleaded guilty; it was thereupon urged that all the other prisoners were entitled to an acquittal; that the indictment charged a joint inciting, and there being no evidence of any joint acting, and one prisoner being convicted, the others could not be convicted jointly with her; but Williams, J., overruled the objection. (r)

Where the principal and accessory are tried together upon the same indictment, there is no doubt but that the accessory may enter into the full defence of the principal, and avail himself of every matter of fact and every point of law tending to his acquittal; for the accessory is in this case to be considered as particeps in lite: and this sort of defence necessarily and directly tends to his own acquittal. And where the accessory is brought to his trial after the conviction of the principal, and it comes out in evidence upon the trial of the accessory that the offence of which the principal was convicted did not amount to felony in him, or not to that species of felony with which he was charged, the accessory may avail himself of this, and ought to be acquitted. (s) For though it is not necessary upon such trial on the part of the prosecution to enter into a detail of the evidence on which the conviction was founded, and the record of the conviction is deemed sufficient evidence against the accessory to put him upon his defence; (t) yet the presumption raised by the record that everything in the former proceeding was rightly and properly transacted must, it is conceived, give way to facts manifestly and clearly proved; and that as against the accessory the conviction of the principal will not be conclusive, being as to him res inter alios

The accessory may controvert the guilt of the principal.

acta.(u) This was the opinion of Mr. J. Foster; and upon this opinion the Court, in a case at the Old Bailey, permitted the counsel for an accessory to controvert the propriety of the conviction of the principal by vivâ voce testimony, and to show that the act done by the principal did not amount to a felony, and was only a breach of trust.(v) And in a later case, in the same Court, it was also admitted that the record of the conviction of the principal was not conclusive evidence of the felony against the accessory, and that he has a right to controvert the propriety of such conviction.(w)

But how far an accessory can defend himself in point of fact, by showing that the principal was totally innocent, has been considered as a question of more difficulty, and one which should be handled with caution; because facts for the most part depend upon the credit of witnesses; and when the strength and hinge of a case happen to be disclosed, as they may be by one trial, daily experience convinces us that witnesses for very bad purposes may be too easily procured. Upon this point, however, Mr. J. Foster cites some authorities, which he apprehends to be strong, to show that the accessory may insist upon the innocence of the principal; and then says, 'if it shall manifestly appear, in the course of the accessory's trial, that in point of fact the principal was innocent, common justice seems to require that the accessory should be acquitted. A. is convicted upon circumstantial evidence, strong as that sort of evidence can be, of the murder of B.; C. is afterwards indicted as accessory to this murder; and it comes out upon the trial, by incontestible evidence, that B. is still living (Lord Hale somewhere mentions a case of this kind). Is C. to be convicted or acquitted? The case is too plain to admit of a doubt. Or, suppose B. to have been in fact murdered, and that it should come out in evidence, to the satisfaction of the Court and jury, that the witnesses against A. were mistaken in his person (a case of this kind I have known), and that A. was not, nor could possibly have been, present at the murder.'(x)

Upon an indictment against an accessory, a confession by the principal is not admissible to prove the guilt of the principal; it must be proved aliunde, especially if the principal be alive, and could be called as a witness; and it seems that even the conviction of the principal would not be admissible to prove the guilt of the principal. The prisoner was indicted for receiving sixty sovereigns, which had been stolen by S. Rich. A confession by S. Rich, made before a magistrate in the presence of the prisoner, in which she stated various facts implicating the prisoner, was tendered in evidence. Mr. J. Patteson refused to receive anything that was said by S. Rich respecting the prisoner, but admitted what she said respecting herself only. S. Rich had been found guilty on another indictment, but had not been sentenced, and might have been called as a witness. The judges (except Lord Lyndhurst, C. B., and Taunton, J.)(y) were unanimously of opinion that Rich's confession was no evidence against the prisoner; and many of them appeared to think that had Rich been convicted, and the indictment against the prisoner stated not her conviction, but her guilt, the conviction would not have been any evidence of her guilt, which must have been proved by other means.(z) And upon the authority of this case, where an accessory before the fact to a murder was tried after the principal had been convicted and executed, Parke, B., ordered the proceedings to be conducted in the same manner as if the principal was then on his trial, and the evidence against the accessory was not gone into until the case against the principal was concluded.(a) Where two persons were indicted together, one for stealing and the other for receiving, and the principal pleaded guilty, Wood, B., refused to allow the plea of guilty to establish the fact of the stealing by the principal as against the receiver.(b)

Quare, whether the conviction of the principal be evidence against the accessory?

The prisoner was indicted as an accessory after the fact to one Mills, who was charged with sending letters demanding money with menaces, and Erle, J., held that these letters were admissible in evidence against the accessory, for it was necessary to prove a demand of the money, and these letters constituted the demand. They were, therefore, evidence of acts done. It would have been very different if they had been mere written statements made by Mills that she had made a demand. They could not then be admitted against the prisoner.(c) And where Read was indicted as accessory before the fact to Simpson, and conversations with Simpson in the absence of Read were offered in evidence, Maule, J., refused to admit them.(d) And where on an indictment against Hawkey and Pym for murder, Pym was tried first, and Hawkey was alleged to have fired the fatal shot in a duel, it was held that it might be proved that Hawkey on the morning before the duel had said 'I will shoot him as I would a partridge.' Erle, J., saying, 'this statement is an act indicating malice aforethought in Hawkey, and that is a fact which the jury have to ascertain. The intentions of a person can only be inferred from external manifestations, and words are some of the most usual and best evidence of intention. It is not a declaration after the act done narrating the past, but it shows the mind of the party.'(e) In the same case Erle, J., held that what Hawkey said after the duel relating to what passed at the spot where the duel took place was not admissible.(f)

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

OF INDICTABLE OFFENCES.

[44] OFFENCES which may be made the subject of indictment, and are below the crime of treason, may be divided into two classes, felonies and misdemeanors.

Felony defined. The term felony appears to have been long used to signify the degree or class of crime committed, rather than the penal consequence of forfeiture occasioned by the crime, according to its original signification. The proper definition of it, however, as stated by an excellent writer, recurs to the subject of forfeiture, and describes the word as signifying—an offence which occasions a total forfeiture of either lands or goods, or both, at the common law; and to which capital or other punishment may be superadded according to the degree of guilt. (a) Capital punishment does by no means enter into the true definition of felony: but the idea of felony is so generally connected with that of capital punishment, that it is hard to separate them; and to this usage the interpretations of the law have long conformed. Therefore, formerly, if a statute made any new offence felony, the law implied that it should be punished with death as well as with forfeiture, unless the offender prayed the benefit of clergy, which all felons were entitled once to have, unless the same was expressly taken away by statute. (b)

With regard to felonies created by statute, it seems clear that not only those crimes which are made felonies in express words, but also all those which are decreed to have or undergo judgment of life and member by any statute become felonies thereby, whether the word 'felony' be omitted or mentioned. (c) And where a statute declares that the offender shall, under the particular circumstances, be deemed to have feloniously committed the act, it makes the offence a felony, and imposes all the common and ordinary consequences attending a felony. (d) So where a statute says that an offence, previously a misdemeanor, 'shall be deemed and construed to be a felony,' instead of declaring it to be a felony in distinct and positive terms, the offence is thereby made a felony. (e) An enactment that an offence shall be felony, which was felony at common law, does not create a new offence. (f) An offence shall never be made felony by the construction of any doubtful and ambiguous words of a statute; and therefore, if it be prohibited under 'pain of forfeiting all that a man has,' or of 'forfeiting body and goods,' or of being 'at the king's will for body, land, and goods,' it shall amount to no more than a high misdemeanor. (g) And though a statute make the doing of an act felonious, yet if a subsequent statute make it penal only, the latter statute is considered as a virtual repeal of the former, so far as relates to the punishment of the offence. (h) Where therefore a statute made an offence punishable with death and a subsequent statute imposed a forfeiture of twenty pounds for the same offence when first committed recoverable before justices of the peace, and made the second offence felony, the latter statute was held to be a virtual repeal of the former. (i) If also a later statute expressly alters the quality of an offence by making it a misdemeanor instead of a felony, the offence cannot be prosecuted under the former statute, and the same consequence follows from altering the procedure and the punishment. (k)

And where a statute makes a second offence felony, or subject to a heavier punishment than the first, it is always implied that such second offence ought to be committed after a conviction for the first; from whence it follows, that if it be not so laid in the indictment, it shall be punished but as the first offence: for the gentler method shall first be tried, which perhaps may prove effectual. (l) Where a statute makes an offence felony which was before only a misdemeanor, an indictment would not lie for it as a misdemeanor. (m)

The word misdemeanor, in its usual acceptation, is applied to all those crimes and offences for which the law has not provided a particular name; and they may be punished, according to the degree of the offence, by fine or imprisonment, or both. (n) A misdemeanor is, in truth, any crime less than a felony; and the word is generally used in contradistinction to felony; misdemeanors comprehending all indictable offences which do not amount to felony, as perjury, battery, libels, conspiracies and public nuisances. (o) Misdemeanors have been sometimes termed misprisions: indeed, the word misprision, in its larger sense, is used to signify every considerable misdemeanor which has not a certain name given to it in the law; and it is said that a misprision is contained in every treason or felony whatsoever, and that one who is guilty of felony or treason may be proceeded against for a misprision only, if the king please. (p) But generally misprision of felony is taken for a concealment of felony, or a procuring the concealment thereof, whether it be felony by the common law, or by statute; (q) and silently to observe the commission of a felony, without using any endeavours to apprehend the offender, is a misprision; a man being bound to discover the crime of another to a magistrate with all possible expedition. (r) If this offence were accompanied with some degree of maintenance given to the felon, the party committing it might be liable as an accessory after the fact. (s) offences.

It is clear that all felonies, and all kinds of inferior crimes of a public nature, as misprisings, and all other contempts, all disturbances of the peace, oppressions, misbehaviour by public officers, and all other misdemeanors whatsoever of a public evil example against the common law, may be indicted. (t) And it seems to be an established principle, that whatever openly outrages decency and is injurious to public morals, is a misdemeanor at common law. (u) Thus the exposure of a man's person in a public place is indictable. (v) Also it seems to be a good general ground, that wherever a statute prohibits a matter of public grievance to the liberties and security of a subject, or commands a matter of public convenience, as the repairing of the common streets of a town, an offender against such statute is punishable not only at the suit of the party aggrieved, but also by way of indictment for his contempt of the statute, unless such method of proceeding do manifestly appear to be excluded by it. (w) But no injuries of a private nature are indictable, unless they in some way concern the king (x)

tender years.

It is an indictable offence, in the nature of a misdemeanor, to refuse or neglect to provide sufficient food or other necessaries for any infant of tender years, unable to provide for and take care of itself (whether such infant be child, apprentice, or servant), whom the party is obliged by duty or contract to provide for; so as thereby to injure its health. will hardly bear an indictment. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, s. 4.

It was objected, that this was only a private matter of account, and not indictable: but the Court held otherwise, as it related to the public revenue.

(y) Rex v. Friend and his Wife, MS. Bayley, J., and R. & R. 20. Chambre, J., differed, thinking it not an indictable offence, but a matter founded wholly on contract, in this which was the case of an apprentice. was their duty to supply her with sufficient food, &c., and also to permit her to have sufficient food, &c., and that they neglected to supply her with sufficient food &c., and refused to permit her to have sufficient food, &c.; whereby her health was injured. W. was between fourteen and seventeen years of age during the time of the ill-treatment alleged, and it did not appear that she was prevented from going out and complaining of the treatment she received. It was held, first, that W. was not an infant of tender years. A person of tender years is a person incapable of acting or judging for himself. And children of much earlier age may contract marriage and other relations, and are competent in law to act for themselves. Secondly, that the terms 'under the care and control' of the prisoners meant under such control as to be prevented from acting for herself, and that this girl was a free agent; and, therefore, the indictment was not proved. (z)

A girl above fourteen is not of tender years.

What is the meaning of care and control of a master.

The health must be injured to support an indictment.

In these cases it must be both alleged and proved that the health was injured. The indictment alleged that the prisoner was the mother, and had the care of an infant female child unable to support itself, and that it was the duty of the prisoner to support the child, but that the prisoner unlawfully neglected to support it, and unlawfully abandoned it without necessary food for a long space of time, whereby the child was greatly injured and weakened. The prisoner was the wife of a seaman, and received a portion of his pay, and was able to work and get her living if she chose; she left the child without food from Monday evening till Thursday morning, and but for the attention of a poor neighbour, the child must have suffered most severely, and might probably have died for want of food, and though it did suffer in some degree from want of food, it was not to any serious extent; and it was held that the conduct of the prisoner in absenting herself, irrespective of any actual injury to the child, was not a misdemeanor at common law, and therefore it was necessary to prove the averment that the child was greatly injured and weakened; and that the evidence that the child had suffered to some but not to any serious extent was not sufficient; as it did not show any injury to the health. (a)

Parents are bound to apply for parochial relief.

It has been laid down that it is the bounden duty of all persons having children of tender age, when they themselves cannot support them, to endeavour to obtain the means of getting them support; and if they wilfully abstain for several days from going to the union where they have by law a right to support, they are criminally responsible for the consequences. (b)

The power to obtain relief from a union does not support an averment that a food for the child, whereby its life was endangered. There was no evidence that the prisoner actually had the means of supporting the child; but it was proved that she could have applied to the relieving officer of the union, and, had she done so, she would have been entitled to and would have received relief for herself and the child adequate to their due support and maintenance, and that she had not made any such application; and it was held that there was no evidence that the prisoner had the means of maintaining the child, and therefore that allegation in the indictment was not proved. (c)

But it is not an indictable offence for a brother to neglect to maintain another brother, even if he be an idiot, helpless, and an inmate of his house. (d)

Insufficient indictment for not taking care of a lunatic.

Where a count charged that B. S. was the illegitimate son of the prisoner, and that B. S. for a long space of time was of unsound intellect and incapable of taking care of himself, and during all that time had resided with the prisoner, who had sufficient means for the maintenance of herself and B. S.; whereupon it became the duty of the prisoner to take due and proper care of B. S., nevertheless the prisoner did not nor would take due and proper care of B. S., but on the contrary thereof during that time maliciously and unlawfully kept and confined B. S. in a dark cold and unwholesome room, and neglected to provide B. S. with proper clothing, and suffered the body of B. S. to be foul, &c., and divers large quantities of filth to collect in the said room and to cause noxious and unwholesome smells, and kept B. S. without sufficient and proper air, warmth, and exercise necessary for the health of B. S. The Court of Queen's Bench arrested the judgment, observing that 'there was no averment that the lunatic was under the control of the prisoner, nor any alleged duty in her to take care of him shown. Again, even if such duty had been shown, acts of commission and omission were charged very likely to produce injury, but it was not alleged that injury was actually produced; and it is by no means a necessary consequence of such acts, nor was it alleged to have been the actual consequence of them, nor even to have continued so long that injury must, or probably would result. There was therefore nothing at most beyond a probable conjecture that the patient's suffering was at all connected with his mother's misconduct.' (e)

So where a count charged that the prisoner intending to injure B. S., being a person of unsound intellect and incapable of taking care of himself, whilst B. S. was under the care, custody and control of the prisoner, maliciously and unlawfully kept, confined and imprisoned B. S., &c.; the Court of Queen's Bench arrested the judgment for want of a positive averment that B. S. was under the care and control of the prisoner at the time she committed the acts alleged in the indictment. 'They were all said to have been done whilst the unfortunate lunatic was under her care and control; but there was no averment that he ever was so.' (f)

The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96, s. 9, enacts that 'if any superintendent, officer, nurse, attendant, servant or other person employed in any registered hospital or licensed house, or any person having the care or charge of any single patient, or any attendant of any single patient, in any way abuse or ill-treat or wilfully neglect any patient in such hospital, or house, or such single patient, or if any person detaining or taking or having the care or charge, or concerned or taking part in the custody, care, or treatment of any lunatic or person alleged to be a lunatic, in any way abuse or ill-treat or wilfully neglect such lunatic or alleged lunatic, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject to indictment for every such offence or to forfeit for every such offence, on a summary conviction thereof before two justices, any sum not exceeding twenty pounds.'

Punishment of ill-treatment of lunatics.

On an indictment under this clause it appeared that the prisoner and his wife were living together, and that she was a lunatic, and that he knew her to be so, and that during a considerable time he abused, ill-treated and neglected her, and it was held that the prisoner was not 'a person having the care or charge' of a lunatic within this clause, which was not intended to apply to persons having a custody of a purely domestic character. (g)

The clause does not apply to a husband.

So long as an act rests in bare intention, it is not punishable: but immediately when an act is done, the law judges not only of the act done, but of the intent with which it is done; and if accompanied with an unlawful and malicious intent, though the act itself would otherwise have been innocent, the intent being criminal, the act becomes criminal and punishable. (h) Therefore an attempt to commit a felony is, in many cases, a misdemeanor. (i) Thus abandoning a child without food with intent that it may die, is indictable, (k) and an attempt to commit even a misdemeanor has been decided in many cases to be itself a misdemeanor. (l) Thus

Attempts to commit crimes.

'by the common law if a child perish for want of proper care, it is murder in the party neglecting it,' Lord Denman, C.J., said 'if the person has the actual custody,' and Patteson, J., added 'or the child be part of his family.' And as a person incapable of taking care of himself through imbecility of mind, is in contemplation of law in the same situation as an infant (Rex v. Much Cowarne, 2 B. & Ad. 861), it should seem that if a person, who is the parent, or has the actual custody of a lunatic, neglects to provide for such lunatic, though more than twenty-one years of age, whereby his health is injured, such person would be indictable in the same manner as if the lunatic were a child of such tender years as to be unable to provide for and take care of itself. But it seems agreed at this day, that felony shall not be imputed to a bare intention to commit it; yet it is certain that the party may be very severely fined for such an intention.' Probably the latter part of this passage was intended to relate to an intention manifested by some act. And see 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 55.

An attempt to commit felony is a misdemeanor; an attempt to commit a misdemeanor is a misdemeanor, whether the offence be so by common law or by statute.

if a party makes a false oath before a surrogate to procure a marriage license, that is an act done and a misdemeanor. (m) And the mere soliciting another to commit a felony is a sufficient act or attempt to constitute the misdemeanor. Thus, to solicit a servant to steal his master's goods is a misdemeanor, though it be not charged in the indictment that the servant stole the goods, nor that any other act was done except the soliciting and inciting. (n) It was held not to be necessary, in order to show that this was only a misdemeanor, to negative the commission of the felony; as none of the precedents of indictments for attempts to commit rape or robbery contain any such negative averment: but it is left to the defendant to show, if he please, that the misdemeanor was merged in the greater offence. But a person cannot be guilty of inciting another to commit a felony unless the party incited knows that the act intended is a felony. (o) And it has been held, that the completion of an act, criminal in itself, is not necessary to constitute criminality. (p) An attempt to commit a statutable misdemeanor, is as much indictable as an attempt to commit a common law misdemeanor, (q) for when an offence is made a misdemeanor by statute, it is made so for all purposes. (r) And the general rule is, that 'an attempt to commit a misdemeanor is a misdemeanor, whether the offence is created by statute, or was an offence at common law.' (s)

But an act is not indictable as an attempt to commit an offence, unless it is an act directly approximating to the commission of that offence. (t) In many cases, however, acts in furtherance of a criminal purpose may be sufficiently proximate to an offence, and may sufficiently show a criminal intent to support an indictment for a misdemeanor, although they may not be sufficiently proximate to the offence to support an indictment for an attempt to commit it; as where a prisoner procures dies for the purpose of making counterfeit foreign coin, (u) or where a person gives poison to another, and endeavours to procure that person to administer it. (v)

Upon the same principles some earlier cases appear to have proceeded. Thus, it was held indictable to attempt to bribe a cabinet minister and a member of the privy council to give the defendant an office in the colonies. (w) And an information was another to commit the misdemeanor of sending a challenge to fight, was held to be an indictable misdemeanor. And by Lawrence, J., in Higgins's case, 'all such acts or attempts as tend to the prejudice of the community are indictable.'

granted against a man for promising money to a member of a corporation, to induce him to vote for the election of a mayor; (x) an information also appears to have been exhibited against a person for attempting by bribery to influence a jurymen in giving his verdict. (y) And it is laid down generally, that if a party offers a bribe to a judge, meaning to corrupt him in the cause depending before him, and the judge takes it not, yet this is an offence punishable by law in the party that offers it. (z) And an attempt to suborn a person to commit perjury, upon a reference to the judges, was unanimously holden by them to be a misdemeanor. (a)

Where the defendant was indicted for having coining instruments in his custody, with intent to coin half guineas, shillings, and six-pences and to utter them as and for the current coin, Lord Hardwicke doubted what the offence was. But the Court of King's Bench held the offence to be a misdemeanor; Lee, C. J., saying, that 'all that was necessary in such a case was an act charged, and a criminal intention joined to that act.' (b) But though this doctrine be correct, it does not appear to have been applicable to the facts of the case as charged, which did not amount to a criminal act by the defendant. And this case was considered untenable in a case, in which it was holden that having counterfeit silver in possession with intent to utter it as good is no offence, there being no criminal act done. The prisoner had been found guilty of unlawfully having in possession counterfeit silver coin with intent to utter it as good: but the judges were of opinion that there must be some act done to constitute a crime, and that the having in possession only was not an act. (c) And this distinction was acted upon in a case where some counts charged the prisoner with preserving and keeping in his possession obscene prints, with intent unlawfully to utter the same, and others charged the prisoner with obtaining and procuring obscene prints with a like intent; and it was held that the former counts were bad, for they were consistent with the possibility that the prisoner might have originally had the prints in his possession with an innocent intention, and there was no act shown to be done which could be considered as the first step in the commission of a misdemeanor; but that the latter counts were good, for the procuring of such prints was an act done in the commencement of a misdemeanor. (d) But the having a large quantity of counterfeit coin in possession, under suspicious circumstances and unaccounted for, is evidence of having procured it with intent to utter it as good, which is clearly a criminal act punishable as a misdemeanor. Thus upon an indictment for procuring counterfeit shillings with intent to utter them as good, the evidence was that two parcels were found upon the prisoner containing about twenty shillings each, wrapped up in soft paper to prevent their rubbing, and there was nothing to induce a suspicion that the prisoner had coined them; and the judges were of opinion unanimously, that procuring with intent to utter was an offence, and that the having in possession unaccounted for, and without any circumstances to induce a belief that the prisoner was the maker, was evidence of procuring. (e) But the effect of such evidence would be removed by circumstances sufficient to induce a suspicion that the prisoner was the maker of the coin found in his possession; and, upon the argument in the last case, Thomson, C. B., mentioned a case where he had directed an acquittal, because, from certain powder found upon the prisoner, there was a presumption that he was the maker of the coin. (f) Upon an indictment for procuring counterfeit money with intent to utter it, the uttering the money, knowing it to be counterfeit, is evidence that it was procured with that intent. (g)

With respect to persons having implements for house-breaking, &c., in their possession with a felonious intent, the Legislature has made some provisions. The 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4, made persons having in their possession implements of house-breaking or weapons with intent to commit any felonious act, liable to be summarily convicted; and the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 58, makes persons armed with offensive weapons, or in possession of implements of house-breaking, guilty of a misdemeanor. And in some instances an act, accompanied with a certain intent, has been made a felony by particular statutes; as by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 38, the severing with intent to steal the ore of any metal, or any coal, &c., from any mine, bed or vein thereof, is made felony punishable by two years imprisonment. And by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 14, the damaging certain articles in a course of manufacture, with intent to destroy them, and the entering certain places with intent to commit such offence, is made felony punishable by penal servitude for life or imprisonment, &c.

Where an offence is not so at common law, but made an offence by Act of Parliament, an indictment will lie where there is a substantive prohibitory clause in such statute, though there be afterwards a particular provision and a particular remedy given. (h)

In the marginal note to Parker's case, 1 Leach, 41, it is stated, that having the possession of counterfeit money with intention to pay it away as and for good money, is an indictable offence at common law. This may be criminal in some cases of such possession as we have seen above: but, quære, if the point, as stated in the marginal note, was actually decided in Parker's case.

Thus, an unqualified person may be indicted for acting as an attorney contrary to the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 2, although sec. 35 and sec. 36 enact, that in case any person shall so act he shall be incapable of recovering his fees, and such offence shall be deemed a contempt of court and punishable accordingly. (i) And it is stated as an established principle that when a new offence is created by an Act of Parliament, and a penalty is annexed to it by a separate and substantive clause, it is not necessary for the prosecutor to sue for the penalty; but he may proceed on the prior clause, on the ground of its being a misdemeanor. (k) And wherever a statute forbids the doing of a thing, the doing it wilfully, although without any corrupt motive, is indictable. (l) Thus, under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 95, s. 15, which makes it a misdemeanor if any person 'shall wilfully do, or cause to be done, anything in such a manner as to obstruct any engine or carriage using any railway,' Maule, J., held, that if a person designedly placed on a railway substances having a tendency to produce an obstruction, he was within the Act, and that it was not necessary that he should have placed them there expressly with the view to obstruct an engine. (m) If a statute enjoin an act to be done, without pointing out any mode of punishment, an indictment will lie for disobeying the injunction of the Legislature. (n) Thus, the father of a child is indictable if, being requested by the registrar within forty-two days of its birth so to do, he wilfully refuse to inform the registrar of the particulars required by the Act to be registered touching the birth, contrary to the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 86, s. 20. (o) And this mode of proceeding in such case is not taken away by a subsequent statute pointing out a particular mode of punishment for such disobedience. (p) Where the same statute which enjoins an act to be done contains also an enactment providing for a particular mode of proceeding, as commitment, in case of neglect or refusal, it has been doubted whether an indictment

(k) By Ashurst, J., in Rex v. Harris, 4 T. R. 205. And this principle has been held to apply, where the clause annexing the penalty was in the same section of the statute. Thus the repealed clause, 5 Eliz. c. 4, s. 31, enacted, 'that it shall not be lawful to any person to set up, &c., any craft, mystery, &c., except he shall have been brought up therein seven years as an apprentice,' &c., upon pain that every person willingly offending or doing the contrary forfeit for every default forty shillings for every month; and the method of proceeding upon this statute was either by information qui tam in the court of oyer and terminer or sessions of the county, &c., where the offence was committed, to recover the penalty, or by indictment in those courts. See the cases collected in the note to Rex v. Kilderby, 1 Saund. 312 a. But it should be observed that a subsequent section (39) gave authority to proceed by indictment, or by information, &c.

magistrates to grant an ale license where they had no jurisdiction. See Reg. v. Nott, 4 Q. B. 768, where Lord Denman, C. J., said 'If the statute in terms create an offence all persons are bound to know it. But if a statute enacts something without in terms making it an offence, and you would convict a person of misdemeanor in having disobeyed such an enactment, are you not bound to show that the disobedience was wilful, and in the nature of contempt?' will lie. (q) But where a statute only adds a further penalty to an offence prohibited by the common law, there is no doubt but that the offender may still be indicted, if the prosecutor think fit, at the common law. (r) Where a statute makes that felony which before was a misdemeanor only, the misdemeanor is merged, and there can be no prosecution afterwards for the misdemeanor; (rr) but if it gives a new punishment or new mode of proceeding for what before was a misdemeanor, without altering the class or character of the offence, the new punishment or new mode of proceeding is cumulative only, and the offender may be proceeded against as before for the common law misdemeanor. Therefore, notwithstanding the provisions of 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 32, against blasphemy, it was held that a blasphemous libel might be prosecuted as a common law offence. (s) It may be observed also, that it is an offence at common law to obstruct the execution of powers granted by statute. (t) But where a public Act regulates rights which are merely private, an indictment will not lie for the infringement of those rights: as, if a statute empowers the setting out of private roads and the directing their repairs, an indictment does not lie for not repairing them. (u)

created by statute are not indictable.

Where the statute making a new offence only inflicts a forfeiture and specifies the remedy, an indictment will not lie. (v) The true rule is stated to be this: Where the offence was punishable by a common law proceeding, before the passing of a statute which prescribes a particular remedy by a summary proceeding, then either method may be pursued, as the particular remedy is cumulative, and does not exclude the common law punishment; but where the statute creates a new offence by prohibiting and making unlawful anything which was lawful before, and appoints a particular remedy against such new offence by a particular sanction and particular method of proceeding, such method of proceeding must be pursued and no other. (w) The mention of other methods of proceeding impliedly excludes that of indictment; (x) unless such methods of proceeding are given by a separate and substantive clause. (y) Thus it has been held, (z) and seems now to be settled, (a) that where a statute making a new offence, not prohibited by the common law, appoints in the same clause a particular manner of proceeding against the offender, as by commitment or action of debt or information, without mentioning an indictment, no indictment can be maintained. forfeit £10 per month; and it was decided on this statute, that as the clause prohibiting the act specified the punishment, the defendant was not liable to be indicted. (b) And it was held not to be an indictable offence to keep an alehouse without a license, because a particular punishment, namely, that the party be committed by two justices, was provided by the statute. (c) And an indictment for assaulting and beating a custom-house officer in the execution of his office was quashed, because the 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 11, s. 6, appointed a particular mode of punishment for that offence. Amongst other decisions as to cases which cannot be made the subject of indictment, it appears to have been ruled that an indictment will not lie for setting a person on the footway in a street to distribute handbills, whereby the footway was impeded and obstructed; (g) nor for throwing down skins into a public way, by which a personal injury is accidentally occasioned; (h) nor for acting, not being qualified, as a justice of peace; (i) nor for selling short measure; (k) nor for excluding commoners by enclosing; (l) nor for an attempt to defraud, if neither by false tokens or conspiracy; (m) nor for secreting

This last case was an indictment against a miller, for receiving good barley to grind at his mill, and delivering a mixture of oat and barley meal, different from the produce of the barley, and which was musty and unwholesome. On the part of the prosecution, a note in 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 71, s. 1, referring to 1 Sess. Ca. 217, was cited, where it is laid down, 'that changing corn by a miller, and returning bad corn instead of it, is punishable by indictment; for, being in the way of trade, it is deemed an offence against the public;' but it was held that the indictment would not lie. Lord Ellenborough, in giving judgment, said, that if the allegation had been that the miller delivered the mixture as an article for the food of man, it might possibly have sustained the indictment, but that he could not say that its being musty and unwholesome necessarily and ex vi termini imported, that it was for the food of man; and it was not stated that it was to be used for the sustentation of man, but only that it was a mixture of oat and barley meal. His Lordship then proceeds: 'As to the other point, that this is not an indictable offence, because it respects a matter transacted in the course of trade, and where no tokens were exhibited by Indictment for abandoning a child with intent to burthen the parish.

Where an indictment charged that the prisoner contriving to injure the inhabitants of the parish of Barking, and unjustly to burthen the said parish with the charge and maintenance of a female child of very tender age, unlawfully did take the said child into the said parish, and there in a certain open highway unlawfully did leave and desert the said child contrary to her duty in that behalf, the said child being unable to take care of herself; after a verdict of guilty, the indictment was held to disclose no offence, as it did not allege that the child was settled elsewhere than in Barking. (r) So where an indictment alleged that the prisoner contriving to injure the inhabitants of the parish of Bathwicke, and unjustly to burthen them with the maintenance of her bastard child, being of very tender age and unable to move or walk, unlawfully did abandon the said child in the said parish without having provided any means for the support of the said child, the said child not being settled in the said parish; it was held that the indictment was bad, because the mere abandonment, the possible consequence of which might be to injure the parish, was not an indictable offence. Wheatley*, and the other cases, as not being indictable.* And see also Rex v. Bower, Cowp. 323, as to the point that for an imposition, which a man's own prudence ought to guard him against, an indictment does not lie, but he is left to his civil remedy. But in *Rex v. dence of an intent to burthen a parish.

It has been held that administering a poisonous ingredient with intent to hurt and damage the body, and whereby sickness and disorder of the body is caused, is not indictable. (u)

Injurious acts or omissions not indictable.

Cases of non-feasance and particular wrong done to another are not in general the subject of indictment: and it has been doubted whether a clergyman is indictable for refusing to marry persons who were lawfully entitled to be married; (v) but we have seen that circumstances may exist of mere non-feasance towards a child of tender years (such as the neglect or refusal of a master to provide sufficient food and sustenance for such a child, being his servant and under his dominion and control), which may amount to an indictable offence. (w)

It has been held, that where a mayor of a city, being a justice, made an order that a company in the city should admit one to be a freeman of that corporation, and the master of the company, being served with the order, refused to obey it, such refusal was not the subject of indictment. (x) And an indictment will not lie for not curing a person of a disease according to promise, for it is not a public offence, and no more in effect than a ground for an action on the case. (y) To keep an open shop in a city, not being free of the city, contrary to the immemorial custom there, has been held not to be indictable. (z)

With regard to trespasses, it has been held that a mere act of trespass (such as entering a yard and digging the ground, and erecting a shed or cutting a stable) committed by one person, unaccompanied by any circumstances constituting a breach of the peace, is not indictable; and the Court quashed such indictment on motion. (a) And an indictment against one person for pulling off the thatch of a man's house, who was in the peaceable possession of it, was also quashed on motion. (b) So an indictment for taking away chattels must import that such a degree of force was used as made the taking an offence against the public. An indictment averred that the defendant with force and arms unlawfully, forcibly, and injuriously seized, took, and carried away, of and from J. Punishment of felonies.

Effect of the

With regard to the punishment of misdemeanors, it may be laid down as a general rule that all those offences less than felony, which exist at common law, and have not been regulated by any particular statute, are within the discretion of the Court to punish. (g) Fine and imprisonment appear to be the most ordinary judgments in cases of misdemeanor; but a fine cannot be imposed on a married woman, as she has nothing to pay the fine with. (h) The pillory was also a common punishment in these cases; but it was abolished by the 1 Vict. c. 23 and the 56 Geo. 3, c. 128; which by sec. 2 empowers the Court to pass such sentence of fine or imprisonment, or of both, in lieu of a sentence of pillory, as to the Court shall seem proper. Whipping also was ordinarily awarded in former times, but of later years it seems never to have been adjudged. In all cases of misdemeanor, in addition to any punishment that may be awarded, the Court may require the defendant to find sureties to keep the peace and be of good behaviour, (i) and even a married woman may be required to find such sureties. (k) But she cannot herself be bound by recognizance, because being a feme covert she cannot enter into it. (l)

Where no particular punishment is prescribed by any statute for any felony, it is punishable under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, s. 8. (m)

As questions occasionally arise as to the effect of the repeal of statutes creating offences, it may be well to notice this subject. 'It has been long established that when an Act of Parliament is repealed, it must be considered (except as to transactions past and closed) as if it had never existed.' inhabitants of a parish for the non-repair of a highway, and the proceedings were removed into the Court of Queen's Bench, and the defendants pleaded, and issues of fact were joined, and a verdict found against the defendants, and the issues had been joined before, but tried after, the day on which the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, repealing the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, came into operation, the judgment was arrested, on the ground that the power to give judgment upon a presentment made under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, was gone. (o) So where the liability to repair certain highways in a parish was taken away from the parish by a statute, and cast upon certain townships, and the statute gave a form of indictment against the townships for non-repair, and one of the townships was indicted under the Act, but before the trial the Act was repealed, and a verdict was found against the township, the judgment was arrested, on the ground that, although whatever had been done under the Act before it was repealed was valid, the statute when repealed was, with regard to any future operation, as if it had never existed, and the effect of the repeal is the same whether the alteration affect procedure only or matter which is more of substance. (p) So where a prisoner was indicted for privately stealing in a shop against the 10 & 11 Will. 3, c. 23, which was repealed after the offence was committed, but before the prisoner was tried, by the 1 Geo. 4, c. 117, s. 1, it was held that the prisoner could not be sentenced under the repealed Act. (q)

Repealing Acts, however, sometimes contain clauses for the purpose of keeping alive the statutes they repeal so far as they relate to offences committed against them, and where a bankrupt had committed an offence against the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 251, and an information had been laid before a magistrate for that offence, and a warrant issued for the prisoner's apprehension, before the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, came into operation, which by sec. 230 repeals the former Act, except as to 'any proceeding pending,' &c., 'or any penalty incurred,' &c., at the commencement of the Act, it was held that there was a proceeding pending within the meaning of this exception, and that the word 'penalty' in it extended to any penal consequences whatever, and was not restricted to a pecuniary penalty, and, consequently, that the bankrupt might be convicted and sentenced under the former Act. BOOK THE SECOND.

OF OFFENCES PRINCIPALLY AFFECTING THE GOVERNMENT, THE PUBLIC PEACE, OR THE PUBLIC RIGHTS.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF COUNTERFEITING OR IMPAIRING COIN—OF IMPORTING INTO THE KINGDOM COUNTERFEIT OR LIGHT MONEY—AND OF EXPORTING COUNTERFEIT MONEY.

SEC. I.

Of Counterfeiting Coin.

[54] THE Legislature has made provision against the counterfeiting of the following descriptions of coin, namely:—I. The King's current gold or silver coin. II. Foreign gold, silver, or copper coin. III. The copper money of this realm.

Of counterfeiting the King's gold and silver coin.

I. The first of these, usually called the King's money, was protected by enactments, which placed the offence of counterfeiting it in the highest class of crimes, upon the ground that the royal majesty of the Crown was affected by such offence in a great prerogative of government; the coining and legitimization of money, and the giving it its current value, being the unquestionable prerogatives of the Crown. (a) But these enactments were repealed by the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 1 (now repealed by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95).

What is the King's money.

It appears that the coin or money of this kingdom consists properly of gold or silver only, with a certain alloy, constituting what is called sterling, coined and issued by the King's authority: and therefore such money is supposed to be referred to by any statute naming 'money' generally. (b) The weight, alloy, impression, and denomination, of money made in this kingdom are generally settled by indenture between the King and the master of the mint: but the 56 Geo. 3, c. 68, provided, with respect to the new silver coinage, that the bullion shall be coined into silver coins of a standard and fineness of eleven ounces two pennyweights of fine silver, and eighteen pennyweights of alloy in the pound troy, and in weight after the rate of sixty-six shillings to every pound troy, whether the same be coined in crowns, half-crowns, shillings, or sixpences, or pieces of a lower denomination. (c) A proclamation has in some cases been made in a more solemn manner of giving the coin currency: but the proclamation in general cases is certainly not necessary, and in prosecutions for coining need not be proved. (d) And it is not necessary in such prosecutions to produce the indentures; though it may be of use in case of any new coin with a new impression, not yet familiar to the people, to produce either the indentures, or one of the officers of the mint cognizant of the fact, or the stamps used, or the like evidence. But in general, whether the coin, upon a question of counterfeiting or impairing it, be the King's money or not, is a mere question of fact which may be found upon evidence of common usage or notoriety. (e) It should be observed, that any coin, once legally made and issued by the King's authority, continues to be the current coin of the kingdom until recalled, notwithstanding any change in the authority by which it was constituted. (f)

The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, which came into effect on the 1st of November, 1861, (g) and applies to England, Scotland, and Ireland, enacts by sec. 1, that, 'In the interpretation of and for the purposes of this Act, the expression "the Queen's current gold or silver coin" shall include any gold or silver coin coined in any of Her Majesty's mints, or lawfully current, by virtue of any proclamation or otherwise, in any part of Her Majesty's dominions, whether within the United Kingdom or otherwise; and the expression "the Queen's copper coin" shall include any copper coin and any coin of bronze or mixed metal coined in any of Her Majesty's mints, or lawfully current, by virtue of any proclamation or otherwise, in any part of Her Majesty's said dominions; and the expression "false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin" shall include any of the current coin which shall have been gilt, silvered, washed, coloured, or cased over, or in any manner altered, so as to resemble or be apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current coin of a higher denomination; and the expression "the Queen's current coin" shall include any coin coined in any of Her Majesty's mints, or lawfully current, by virtue of any proclamation or otherwise, in any part of Her Majesty's said dominions, and whether made of gold, silver, copper, bronze, or mixed metal; and where the having any matter in the custody or possession of any person is mentioned in this Act, it shall include not only the having of it by himself in his personal custody or possession, but also the knowingly and wilfully having it in the actual custody or possession of any other person, and also the knowingly and wilfully having it in any dwelling-house or other building, lodging, apartment, field, or other place, open or enclosed, whether belonging to or occupied by himself or not, and whether such matter shall be so had for his own use or benefit or for that of any other person.' (h)

The words of the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 21, were 'coined in any of his Majesty's mints and lawfully current' in any part of his Majesty's dominions, whether within the United Kingdom or otherwise; and consequently did not include coin which was not coined in any such mint, but was current in any of the colonies by virtue of any proclamation or otherwise; this clause is so framed as to include all such coin, and by that means the provisions of this Act are extended to it.

The definition of the 'Queen's current coin' is new.

In Reg. v. Rogers, 2 M. C. C. R. 85; Reg. v. Gerrish, 2 M. & Rob. 219; and Reg. v. Williams, 1 C. & M. 259, questions had arisen whether a person could be said to be in possession of coin within the meaning of the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 21, which was with his knowledge in the personal possession of another, even though he were in company and acting in concert with such other, and the words 'knowingly and wilfully having it in the actual custody or possession of any other person' were introduced to remove all doubt in such cases.

The words, 'by any means whatsoever,' were introduced in order to include every process by which false metal can be made to appear like gold or silver, whether such appearance be produced by galvanism or otherwise howsoever.

The order of the words in the former clause was 'wash, colour, or case over,' and it was advisedly altered.

Sec. 18. 'Whosoever shall make or counterfeit any kind of coin not being the Queen's current gold or silver coin, but resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any gold or silver coin of any foreign prince, state, or country, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' The offence of counterfeiting the coin may be committed by officers in the mint.

for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (o)

With respect to the offence of counterfeiting the coin in general it may be observed, that not only all such as counterfeit the King's coin without his authority, but even such as are employed by him in the mint, come within the statute, if for their own lucre they make the money of baser alloy, or lighter than by their indentures they are authorized and bound to do: for they can only justify their coining at all under such an authority; and if they have not pursued that authority, it is the same as if they had none. But it is not any mistake in weight or alloy that will make them guilty; the act must be wilful, corrupt, and fraudulent. (p)

What will be a sufficient counterfeiting.

The monies charged to be counterfeited must resemble the true and lawful coin: (q) but this resemblance is a matter of fact of which the jury are to judge upon the evidence before them; the rule being, that the resemblance need not be perfect, but such as may in circulation ordinarily impose upon the world. (r) Thus a counterfeiting with some small variation in the inscription, effigies, or arms, done probably with intent to evade the law, is yet within it; and so is the counterfeiting in a different metal, if in appearance it be made to resemble the true coin. (s)

Where, on an indictment for uttering a counterfeit half sovereign, the coin was, in reality, a Prince of Wales's medal; and though on one side it bore some resemblance to a good half-sovereign, having Her Majesty's head and the usual inscription, on the other side was the plume of the Prince of Wales, with the words 'Prince of Wales's model half-sovereign,' and it was held that it was a question for the jury whether this coin was intended by the maker to pass as a counterfeit coin, or was merely designed for a play-thing, a card-marker, &c. (t)

Round blanks like shillings worn smooth by circulation.

It is quite clear that there will be a sufficient counterfeiting where the counterfeit money is made to resemble coin, the impression on which has been worn away by time. In one case the shillings produced in evidence were quite smooth, without the smallest vestige of either head or tail, and without any resemblance of the shillings in circulation, except their colour, size, and shape; and the Master of the Mint proved that they were bad, but that they were very like those shillings the impression on which had been worn away by time, and might very probably be taken by persons having less skill than himself for good shillings; and the Court were of opinion that a blank that is smoothed and made like a piece of legal coin, the impression of which is worn out, and yet suffered to remain in circulation, is sufficiently counterfeited to the similitude of the current coin of this realm to bring the counterfeiters and coiners of such blanks within the statute; these blanks having some reasonable likeness to that coin which has been defaced by time, and yet passed in circulation. (u) In a subsequent case the counsel for the prisoners having objected, upon the fact of no impression of any sort or kind being discernible upon the shillings produced in evidence, that they were not counterfeited to the likeness and similitude of the good and legal coin of the realm, the judges were of opinion, that it was a question of fact whether the counterfeit monies were of the likeness and similitude of the lawful current silver coin called a shilling. And the jury having so found it, the want of an impression was immaterial; because, from the impression being generally worn out or defaced, it was notorious that the currency of the genuine coin of that denomination was not thereby affected; the counterfeit therefore was perfect for circulation, and possibly might deceive the more readily from having no appearance of an impression: and in the deception the offence consists. (r) Before the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, where the imitation of the real coin had not proceeded so far as to fabricate a false coin sufficiently perfect to be circulated, the offence of counterfeiting was not complete. Thus, where the prisoner had forged the impression of a half-guinea on a piece of gold, which was previously hammered, but was not round, nor would pass in the condition it then was, upon reference to the judges, it was held that the crime of counterfeiting was incomplete. (w) And where the prisoners were convicted under the 25 Edw. 3, c. 2, and it appeared that no one piece of the base metal found upon them was in such a state as to make it passable, the conviction was held to be wrong. (x) But by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 30, the offence of counterfeiting shall be deemed complete, although the coin be not in a state fit to be uttered, or the counterfeiting not finished or perfected. (y)

Upon an indictment on the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, s. 4 (now repealed), it appeared that the colour of silver was produced by melting a small portion of good silver with a large portion of base metal, and throwing it, after it had been cut up into round blanks, into aqua fortis, which has the effect of drawing to the surface whatever silver there may be in the composition, and giving the metal the colour and appearance of real silver. A doubt therefore arose, whether this process of extracting the latent silver by the power of the wash from the body to the surface of the blank was colouring with 'a wash and materials' within the meaning of the statute; or whether the Legislature did not intend such a colouring only as is produced by some external application on the surface of the blank. But the judges thought that this process of extracting the latent silver from the body to the surface of the base metal by the power of aqua fortis was a colouring within the words of the statute; (z) and they also thought that it might be charged as a colouring with silver; for the effect of the aqua fortis is to corrode the base metal, and leave the silver only on the superficies; and so the copper is coloured or cased with silver. (a)

So though it was necessary that the blanks should be rubbed after they were taken out of the wash, in order to give them the appearance of silver, the preparing and steeping them in the wash was held to be a colouring within the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, s. 4. The prisoner was apprehended in the very act of steeping round blanks composed of brass and silver in aqua fortis: none of them were in a finished state; but many were taken out of the liquor, and others were found dry. These blanks exhibited the appearance of lead, and some of them had the impression of a shilling, and by rubbing them they might be made perfectly to resemble silver coin; but in their then state the jury found that none of them would pass current. The question was, whether the offence was completed, inasmuch as the colour of silver had not been produced on any of the blanks. There was some difference of opinion amongst the judges upon a case reserved. One judge said, he understood the words 'colour, &c.' to mean producing on the piece of metal the colour of silver, which was not done here; for, without rubbing, the money coined would not pass: and another observed, that the word in the statute was 'producing' in the present tense, and not materials which would produce. But the other judges thought the conviction right. They considered that the offence was complete when the piece was coloured; for it was then coloured with materials which produce the colour of silver; and that it was not necessary that the piece so coloured should be current, for the colouring of blanks was an offence within the clause. And it was observed, that a contrary construction would prevent any conviction until a wash was discovered, which would in the first instance produce a perfect bright shilling or sixpence. (b)

Where the false coin was not so far perfected as to be passable, the offence of counterfeiting was not complete, but now it is by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 30.

Gilding with gold within the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 4.

Upon an indictment on the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 4, which alleged that the prisoner three sixpences 'feloniously did gild with materials capable of producing the colour of gold,' it was proved that the prisoner was apprehended in the act of gilding sixpences with gold, three of which so gilt were found in the room where he was taken: it was objected that the indictment was not proved, as the prisoner had used gold and not materials capable of producing the colour of gold. It was answered, that the latter words might be rejected; to which it was replied, that they could not, as they qualified the word gold, and showed it was not used in the strict sense of the word. A verdict having been directed for the Crown, it was moved, in arrest of judgment, in case the objection should be one on the record. Upon a case reserved, the judges present were unanimous that the indictment was proved, and all, except two, (c) considered the indictment good. (d)

Counterfeiting complete without uttering.

Procuring dies with intent, by means of them and other things, to counterfeit foreign coin contrary

If there be a counterfeiting in fraud of the King, the offence is complete before any uttering, or attempt to utter. (e)

One count charged the prisoner with unlawfully causing to be made two dies, one of the obverse side, the other of the reverse side of a silver half-dollar of Peru, with intent feloniously to make counterfeit Peruvian half-dollars; another count charged him with attempting feloniously to coin by making the dies, with intent to use them in coining such counterfeit coins. The prisoner, without any authority or license so to do, caused to be made by one Jackson, a die sinker (who, though he executed the order, gave notice to the police, and committed no offence against the law), the necessary dies for making a counterfeit dollar of the Republic of Peru. The dies, though suitable and necessary for making such counterfeit coin could not alone produce it; a press, copper blanks, galvanic battery, and a preparation of silver being also necessary for that purpose. The prisoner had procured galvanic batteries, and had been in negotiation for the purchase of a press and copper blanks for the aforesaid purpose; but he had not actually procured either press, blanks or preparation of silver. There was no doubt that the prisoner intended to use the whole apparatus when procured in making counterfeit Peruvian dollars, and the only doubt was whether he intended to coin in Peru only, or in this country also; and it was contended that, if he only intended to make the coin in Peru, no offence had been committed; and even if he did intend to coin in this country, that intention, though coupled with the act of causing the dies to be made in pursuance of such intention, fell short of an attempt to commit a felony. The jury found that the intention of the prisoner was to cause to be made and procure the dies and other apparatus in order therewith to coin counterfeit Peruvian half-dollars, and to make a few only of the counterfeit coin in England by way of trying whether the apparatus would answer before sending it out to Peru, to be there used in making the counterfeit coin, and convicted the prisoner; and upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right. This was not an indictment for an attempt to commit a statutable offence; but the indictment was founded on a criminal intent coupled with an act immediately connected with the offence. Nobody could doubt that the prisoner was in possession of machinery necessarily connected with the offence, for the express purpose of committing it, and which was obtained, and could be obtained, for no other purpose. No doubt the act was done with intent to commit a felony, and was sufficient to support such an indictment as the present. It was an act immediately connected with the offence, and the prisoner could have no other object than to commit the offence. (f)

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 35, 'In the case of every felony punishable under the Act, every principal in the second degree, and every accessory before the fact, shall be punishable in the same manner as the principal in the first degree is by this Act punishable; and every accessory after the fact to any felony punishable under this Act shall be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour.' What not sufficient evidence of counselling, &c.

Proof that a man occasionally visited coiners; that the rattling of money was occasionally heard with them; that he was seen counting something as if it was money when he left them; that, on coming to the lodgings just after their apprehension, he endeavoured to escape, and was found to have had money about him; is not sufficient evidence to implicate him, as counselling, procuring, aiding, and abetting the coining. Two women were indicted for colouring a shilling and sixpence, and a man (Isaacs) as counselling them, &c. The evidence against him was, that he visited them once or twice a week; that the rattling of copper money was heard whilst he was with them; that once he was counting something just after he came out; that on going to the room just after their apprehension he resisted being stopped, and jumped over a wall to escape; and that there were then found upon him a bad three-shilling piece, five bad shillings, and five bad sixpences; but upon a case reserved the judges thought the evidence too slight to convict him. (i)

Venue.

Sec. 28. 'Where any person shall tender, utter, or put off any false or counterfeit coin in one county or jurisdiction, and shall also tender, utter, or put off any other false or counterfeit coin in any other county or jurisdiction, either on the day of such first mentioned tendering, uttering, or putting off, or within the space of ten days next ensuing, (ii) or where two or more persons, acting in concert in different counties or jurisdictions, shall commit any offence against this Act, every such offender may be dealt with, indicted, tried, and punished, and the offence laid and charged to have been committed, in any one of the said counties or jurisdictions, in the same manner in all respects as if the offence had been actually and wholly committed within such one county or jurisdiction.' (k)

The first part is introduced to remove a doubt which had risen whether a person tendering, &c., coin in one jurisdiction, and afterwards tendering, &c., coin in another jurisdiction within sec. 10 (post, p. 120), could be tried in either. As the offence created by that section is only a misdemeanor, probably there was no substantial ground for that doubt, but it was thought better to set the matter at rest.

Offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty.

Sec. 36. 'All indictable offences mentioned in this Act which shall be committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England or Ireland shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature and liable to the same punishments as if they had been committed upon the land in England or Ireland, and may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in any county or place in England or Ireland in which the offender shall be apprehended or be in custody, in the same manner in all respects as if the same had been actually committed in that county or place, and in any indictment for any such offence, or for being accessory to any such offence, the venue in the margin shall be the same as if such offence had been committed in such county or place, and the offence itself shall be averred to have been committed “on the high seas;” [and where any of the crimes and offences, or high crimes and offences, mentioned in this Act, shall be committed at sea, and the vessel in which the same shall be committed shall be registered in Scotland, or touch at any part thereof, the courts of criminal law of Scotland may inquire, try, and determine the same in the same manner as if such crime and offence, or high crime and offence, had been committed in Scotland;] (kk) provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect any of the laws relating to the government of Her Majesty’s land or naval forces.’

Sec. 34. ‘All high crimes and offences, and crimes and offences, against this Act, which may be committed in Scotland, shall be proceeded against and tried according to the rules and procedure of the criminal law of Scotland, [and all proceedings by this Act made competent before any justice or justices, and all and every the powers and authorities by this Act given to or conferred upon any such justice or justices, shall, in Scotland, be competent before and may be exercised by any sheriff, magistrate, or justice of the peace.]’ (l)

Trial of offences in Scotland.

Sec. 29. ‘Where, upon the trial of any person charged with any offence against this Act, it shall be necessary to prove that any coin produced in evidence against such person is false or counterfeit, it shall not be necessary to prove the same to be false and counterfeit by the evidence of any moneyer, or other officer of Her Majesty’s Mint, but it shall be sufficient to prove the same to be false or counterfeit by the evidence of any other credible witness.’ (m)

What shall be sufficient proof of coin being counterfeit.

Sec. 30. ‘Every offence of falsely making or counterfeiting any coin, or of buying, selling, receiving, paying, tendering, uttering, or putting off, or of offering to buy, sell, receive, pay, utter, or put off, any false or counterfeit coin, against the provisions of this Act, shall be deemed to be complete, although the coin so made or counterfeited, or bought, sold, received, paid, tendered, uttered, or put off, or offered to be bought, sold, received, paid, uttered, or put off, shall not be in a fit state to be uttered, or the counterfeiting thereof shall not be finished or perfected.’

Where the counterfeiting coin shall be complete.

This clause is taken from the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 3, which was limited in terms to making or counterfeiting gold or silver coin, and consequently it was held that it did not apply to a case of selling counterfeit coin. The words in italics have, therefore, been added in order to include all cases of ‘buying, selling,’ &c. (mn)

Sec. 31. ‘It shall be lawful for any person whatsoever to apprehend any person who shall be found committing any indictable offence, or any high crime and offence, or crime and offence, against this Act, and to convey or deliver him to some peace officer, constable, or officer of police, in order to his being conveyed as soon as reasonably may be before a justice of the peace or some other proper officer, to be dealt with according to law.’ (n)

Any person may apprehend any person committing any indictable offence against this Act.

(kk) The part between brackets is new.

(l) The earlier part of this clause is framed on the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 15. The part between brackets was added at the suggestion of the Lord Advocate.

(m) This clause is taken from the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 17.

(mn) Reg. v. Bradford, 2 C. & D. 41.

(n) Sec. 33 provides for notice of action, tender of amends, &c. Sec. 32 takes away the certiorari, &c. Sec. 41 provides for summary proceedings.

This clause is new, and clearly unnecessary, as far as it relates to any felony or indictable misdemeanor, for there is no doubt whatever that any person in the act of committing any such offence is liable by the common law to be apprehended by any person; but it was introduced at the instigation of the Solicitors of the Treasury, as it had been found that there was great unwillingness to apprehend in such cases, in consequence of doubts that prevailed among the public as to the right to do so.

The words, 'or officer of police,' were introduced in the House of Commons quite unnecessarily, as without doubt every officer of police is a peace officer; and they render this clause inconsistent with other clauses in some of the other Acts.

Fine and sureties for keeping the peace, in what cases.

Sec. 38. 'Whenever any person shall be convicted of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act the Court may, if it shall think fit, in addition to or in lieu of any of the punishments by this Act authorised, fine the offender, and require him to enter into his own recognizances, and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace and being of good behaviour; and in case of any felony punishable under this Act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, require the offender to enter into his own recognizances and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace, in addition to any punishment by this Act authorised; provided that no person shall be imprisoned under this clause, for not finding sureties, for any period exceeding one year.' (nn)

Hard labour.

Sec. 39. 'Whenever imprisonment, with or without hard labour, may be awarded for any indictable offence under this Act, the Court may sentence the offender to be imprisoned, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, in the common gaol or house of correction.'

Solitary confinement.

Sec. 40. 'Whenever solitary confinement may be awarded for any offence under this Act, the Court may direct the offender to be kept in solitary confinement for any portion or portions of his imprisonment, or of his imprisonment with hard labour, not exceeding one month at any one time, and not exceeding three months in any one year.'

Costs of prosecutions.

Sec. 42. 'In all prosecutions for any offence against this Act in England, which shall be conducted under the direction of the Solicitors of Her Majesty's Treasury, the Court before which such offence shall be prosecuted or tried shall allow the expenses of the prosecution in all respects as in cases of felony; and in all prosecutions for any such offence in England which shall not be so conducted it shall be lawful for such Court, in case a conviction shall take place, but not otherwise, to allow the expenses of the prosecution in like manner; and every order for the payment of such costs shall be made out, and the sum of money mentioned therein paid and repaid, upon the same terms and in the same manner in all respects as in cases of felony.' (nn)

Before the passing of this Act the costs of most prosecutions were paid by the Treasury wherever they were conducted by the Solicitors of the Treasury; but in no other case. As the Solicitors of the Treasury were accustomed to employ attorneys in the country to conduct these prosecutions, and they did not always like to pay the witnesses before they had received the costs of the prosecution from the Treasury, it sometimes happened that the witnesses did not get their expenses till a considerable time after the trial, and the earlier part of this clause was introduced in order that the attorneys might at once obtain the costs of the prosecutions, and pay the witnesses their expenses; and, as in all mint prosecutions so conducted the expenses were invariably paid, the first part of the clause is imperative, and the Court must allow the expenses.

It sometimes also happened that private individuals conducted mint prosecutions, after the officers of the mint had declined to prosecute, and, considering the importance of bringing offenders in such cases to justice, it was thought expedient to give the costs in some of these cases; the second part of the clause therefore gives the Court a discretion to grant the costs in such cases, provided a conviction takes place, but not otherwise. This provision will on the one hand encourage prosecutions where there are substantial grounds for them, and on the other hand it will prevent speculative prosecutions where the evidence is unsatisfactory.

This clause is confined to England, as it was introduced to provide for the state of things there existing.

In many instances of offences relating to the counterfeiting coin, the Legislature have made special provisions for securing the base coin, and also the tools of the offenders; in order that they may be produced in evidence, and afterwards be disposed of in a proper manner. (o)

Coining tools and base money may be produced in evidence.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 27, 'If any person shall find or discover in any place whatever, or in the custody or possession of any person having the same without lawful authority or excuse, any false or counterfeit coin, resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Provision for the discovery and seizure of counterfeit coin and coining tools, for securing them

(o) The Legislature has made other provisions for the suppression of base coin, or coin inferior in value, where there is no criminal charge imputed to the person who may happen to tender it. The 56 Geo. 3, c. 68, s. 7, enacts, that after the period to be mentioned in a proclamation, any persons are required to cut, &c., any piece or pieces of old silver coin of this realm, current at any time before the passing of that Act, which shall be tendered to them in payment, and which shall be of less value than the denomination thereof shall import, and the person tendering the same shall bear the loss: but if any such piece so cut, &c., shall appear to be of the full value which its denomination shall import, the person who shall cut, &c., is required to take the same at the rate it was coined for; and disputes about the value are to be determined by the mayor, &c., or other chief officer of any city, &c. where such tender shall be made; or if the tender be made out of any city, &c., then by some justice of the peace of the county inhabiting or being near the place where the tender shall be made. And by sec. 26 of the new Act, 'Where any coin shall be tendered as the Queen's current gold or silver coin to any person who shall suspect the same to be diminished otherwise than by reasonable wearing or to be counterfeit, it shall be lawful for such person to cut, break, bend, or deface such coin, and if any coin so cut, broken, bent, or defaced shall appear to be diminished otherwise than by reasonable wearing, or to be counterfeit, the person tendering the same shall bear the loss thereof; but if the same shall be of due weight, and shall appear to be lawful coin, the person cutting, breaking, bending, or defacing the same is hereby required to receive the same at the rate it was coined for; and if any dispute shall arise whether the coin so cut, broken, bent, or defaced be diminished in manner aforesaid, or counterfeit, it shall be heard and finally determined in a summary manner by any justice of the peace, who is hereby empowered to examine upon oath as well the parties as any other person, in order to the decision of such dispute; and the tellers at the receipt of Her Majesty's Exchequer, and their deputies and clerks, and the receivers general of every branch of Her Majesty's revenue, are hereby required to cut, break, or deface, or cause to be cut, broken, or defaced, every piece of counterfeit or unlawfully diminished gold or silver coin which shall be tendered to them in payment of any part of Her Majesty's revenue.'

and for ultimately disposing of them.

Queen's current gold, silver or copper coin, or any coin of any foreign prince, state, or country, or any instrument, tool, or engine whatsoever, adapted and intended for the counterfeiting of any such coin, or any filings or clippings, or any gold or silver bullion, or any gold or silver in dust, solution, or otherwise, which shall have been produced or obtained by diminishing or lightening any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, it shall be lawful for the person so finding or discovering and he is hereby required to seize the same, and to carry the same forthwith before some justice of the peace; and where it shall be proved, on the oath of a credible witness before any justice of the peace, that there is reasonable cause to suspect that any person has been concerned in counterfeiting the Queen's current gold, silver, or copper coin, or any such foreign or other coin as in this Act before mentioned, or has in his custody or possession any such false or counterfeit coin, or any instrument, tool, or engine whatsoever adapted and intended for the making or counterfeiting of any such coin, or any other machine used or intended to be used for making or counterfeiting any such coin, or any such filings, clippings, or bullion, or any such gold or silver in dust, solution, or otherwise as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, by warrant under his hand, to cause any place whatsoever belonging to or in the occupation or under the control of such suspected person to be searched, either in the day or in the night, and if any such false or counterfeit coin, or any such instrument, tool, or engine, or any such machine, or any such filings, clippings, or bullion or any such gold or silver in dust, solution, or otherwise as aforesaid, shall be found in any place so searched, to cause the same to be seized and carried forthwith before some justice of the peace; and whensoever any such false or counterfeit coin, or any such instrument, tool, or engine, or any such machine, or any such filings, clippings, or bullion, or any such gold or silver in dust, solution or otherwise as aforesaid, shall in any case whatsoever be seized and carried before a justice of the peace, he shall, if necessary, cause the same to be secured, for the purpose of being produced in evidence against any person who may be prosecuted for any offence against this Act; and all such false and counterfeit coin, and all instruments, tools, and engines adapted and intended for the making or counterfeiting of coin, and all such machines, and all such filings, clippings, and bullion, and all such gold and silver in dust, solution, or otherwise as aforesaid, after they shall have been produced in evidence, or when they shall have been seized, and shall not be required to be produced in evidence, shall forthwith be delivered up to the officers of Her Majesty's Mint, or to the solicitors of Her Majesty's Treasury, or to any person authorised by them to receive the same.' (p)

The parts in italics are introduced in order to provide for the seizure of filings of coin, gold or silver dust, and machines mentioned in the preceding clauses of the Act.

The solicitors of the Treasury now superintend all mint prosecutions. (q)

(p) This clause is framed on 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 14; 37 Geo. 3, c. 126, s. 7; and 43 Geo. 3, c. 139, s. 7.

(q) See the interpretation clause, ante, p. 95.

SEC. II.

Impairing and Defacing Coin.

THE 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 4, enacts that, 'Whosoever shall impair, diminish, or lighten any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, with intent that the coin so impaired, diminished, or lightened may pass for the Queen's current gold or silver coin, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years and not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (qq)

Impairing the gold or silver coin, with intent, &c.

This clause is taken from the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 5, the words of which were 'with intent to make the coin pass,' &c., which intent never existed; for the coin was not impaired in order to make it pass, but in order to obtain some metal from the coin, and that it might nevertheless pass in circulation. The words in italics have therefore been substituted for those of the former enactment.

Sec. 5. 'Whosoever shall unlawfully have in his custody or possession any filings or clippings, or any gold or silver bullion, or any gold or silver in dust, solution, or otherwise, which shall have been produced or obtained by impairing, diminishing, or lightening any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, knowing the same to have been so produced or obtained, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (r)

Unlawful possession of filings or clippings of gold or silver coin.

Sec. 16. 'Whosoever shall deface any of the Queen's current gold, silver, or copper coin, by stamping thereon any names or words, whether such coin shall or shall not be thereby diminished or lightened, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, with or without hard labour.'

Defacing the coin by stamping words thereon.

This clause is taken from the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 102, s. 1, which contained the words 'or shall use any machine or instrument for the purpose of bending the same,' but it was considered that this provision was much too comprehensive, and therefore it was omitted.

(qq) As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 104. See the interpretation clause, ante, p. 95.

(r) This clause is new. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 104. See the interpretation clause, ante, p. 95.

Tender of coin so defaced not to be a legal tender, and penalty for uttering the same.

Sec. 17. 'No tender of payment in money made in any gold, silver, or copper coin so defaced by stamping as in the last preceding section mentioned shall be allowed to be a legal tender; and whosoever shall tender, utter, or put off any coin so defaced shall, on conviction thereof before two justices, be liable to forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding forty shillings: Provided that it shall not be lawful for any person to proceed for any such last-mentioned penalty without the consent, in England or Ireland, of Her Majesty's Attorney-General for England or Ireland respectively, or in Scotland of the Lord Advocate.' (rr)

Having clippings, &c., in possession.

With a view of more effectually preventing the clipping, diminishing, or impairing the current coin of the kingdom, the 6 & 7 Will. 3, c. 17, s. 8, made provision for breaking open houses and searching for bullion; and for the punishment of the person in whose possession bullion was found, not proving it to be lawful silver, and that the same was not before the melting thereof coin nor clippings. (s) Provisions concerning melting down coin were made by the 17 Edw. 4, c. 1, and 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 31. (t) And if money, false or clipped, be found in the hands of any that is suspicious, he may be imprisoned till he hath found his warrant per statutum de monetâ. (u)

Melting coin. [64]

SEC. III.

Of Importing into the Kingdom Counterfeit or Light Money.

Importing counterfeit coin from beyond seas.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 7, 'Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall import or receive into the United Kingdom from beyond the seas any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (r)

The first words in italics were introduced for the reason mentioned in the note to sec. 6. (w)

The words 'or receive' were added to include cases where the offender received coin which had come from abroad, but there was no evidence to bring his offence within the term 'import.'

Under the 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 11 (now repealed), it was held that the words 'false or counterfeit coin or money being current within this realm,' referred to gold and silver coin of foreign realms, current here by the sufferance and consent of the Crown, which must be by proclamation, or by writ under the great seal. And the money, the bringing in of which was prohibited by the 25 Edw. 3, st. 5, c. 2, and 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 11 (both now repealed) must be brought from some foreign place out of the King's dominions into some place within the same, (x) and not from Ireland or some other place subject to the Crown of England, for though to some purposes they are distinct from England, yet as the counterfeiting is punishable there as much as in England, the bringing money from such places is not within those Acts. (y) It may be observed also that these Acts were confined to the importer, and did not extend to a receiver at second hand; and such importer must also have been averred and proved to have known that the money was counterfeit. (z)

It seems to have been the better opinion, that it was not necessary that such false money should be actually paid away or merchandized with, for the words of the 25 Edw. 3 are, to 'merchandize or make payment,' &c., which only import an intention to do so, and are fully satisfied whether the act intended be performed or not; (a) and it is clear that bringing over money counterfeited according to the similitude of foreign coin was treason within the 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 11. (b)

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 19, 'Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall bring or receive into the United Kingdom (c) any such false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any gold or silver coin of any foreign prince, state, or country, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (d)

From the words of the statute, an importation of counterfeit foreign coin, with a knowledge that it is counterfeit, is clearly sufficient, without any actual uttering. The present clause omits the words 'to the intent to utter the same,' which were in the former Act.

(a) 1 Hawk. c. 17, s. 89. But Lord Coke and Lord Hale seem to have thought differently. 3 Inst. 18. 1 Hale, 229. But see 1 East, P. C. c. 4, s. 22, pp. 175, 176, where it is said that though the best trial and proof of an intent be by the act done, yet it may also be evinced by a variety of circumstances, of which the jury are to judge.

(b) 1 Hawk. c. 17, s. 89. It is to be observed, that the new statute has neither the words 'to merchandize or make payment,' which were in the 25 E. 3, nor the words 'to the intent, to utter or make payment with the same,' which were in the 1 & 2 Ph. & M. The crime, therefore, seems now to consist in importing counterfeit coin knowing it to be counterfeit. C. S. G.

foreign counterfeit coin into the
dom.

It seems that this statute does not provide for the case of a person collecting the base money therein mentioned from the vendors of it in this country, with intent to utter it within the realm, or the dominions of the realm. (f)

Of importing light silver

Considerable quantities of old silver coin of the realm, or coin purporting to be such, below the standard of the Mint in weight, were formerly imported, to the public detriment at that time; in consequence of which the 14 Geo. 3, c. 42, prohibited the bringing into the kingdom any such coin, and provided that if any silver coin, being or purporting to be the coin of this realm, exceeding in amount the sum of five pounds, should be found by any officer of His Majesty's Customs on board any ship, &c., or in the custody of any person coming directly from the water-side, or, upon the information of one or more persons, in any house or other place on search there made in the manner directed by a statute of 14 Car. 2, the officer might seize the same; and if, upon examination, it should appear to be of the standard weight, it should be restored; but if it should be less in weight than the standard of the Mint, that is to say, at and after the rate of sixty-two shillings to every pound troy, it should be forfeited. This Act was revived and made perpetual by 39 Geo. 3, c. 75; but the 56 Geo. 3, c. 68, s. 2, enacts that so much of the 14 Geo. 3, c. 42, as enacts that any silver coin of the realm less in weight than after the rate of sixty-two shillings for every pound troy shall be forfeited, and of any Act or Acts for reviving or continuing or making perpetual the provisions of the said Act, in this respect, shall from the passing of that Act be repealed; and the 6 Geo. 4, c. 105, seems wholly to repeal the 14 Geo. 3, c. 42, and 39 Geo. 3, c. 75. (g)

SEC. IV.

Of Exporting Counterfeit Money.

counterfeit
coin.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 8, 'Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall export, or put on board any ship, vessel, or boat for the purpose of being exported from the United Kingdom, any false or counterfeit coin, resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (h)

This clause will include all cases of exporting counterfeit colonial coin.

(f) 1 East, P. C. e. 4, s. 23, p. 177.

(g) The terms of this repeal are very obscure.

(h) This clause is new. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 104. See the interpretation clause, ante, p. 95.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF FRAUDS RELATING TO BULLION, AND OF COUNTERFEITING BULLION.

SEC. I.

Of Frauds relating to Bullion.

BULLION signifies properly either gold or silver in the mass; but is sometimes used to denote those metals in any state other than that of authenticated coin; comprising in this latter sense gold and silver wares and manufactures. Many statutes have been passed for the prevention of frauds with respect to such bullion by creating offences in making, working, putting to sale, exchanging, selling, or exporting, any gold or silver manufactures of less fineness than the standards respectively fixed at the time by the several Acts. But it is not intended to make any particular mention of those statutes; (a) the punishments inflicted by them being in general certain penalties and forfeitures, or, in default of payment, commitment to the house of correction. The knowingly exposing to sale and selling wrought gold under the sterling alloy for gold of the true standard, though indictable in goldsmiths, is a private imposition only in a common person, and the party injured is left to his civil remedy. (b)

Making gold and silver wares under the true alloy.

It is conceived also that offenders fraudulently affixing public and authentic marks on goods of a value inferior to such tokens are liable to suffer at common law upon an indictment for a cheat. J. Fabian, a working goldsmith, was indicted for falsifying plate, by putting in too much alloy, and then corrupting one of the assay master's servants to help him to the proper marks, with which he stamped his plate, and sold it to the goldsmiths; and being convicted, he was fined £100 and adjudged to stand three times in the pillory; and was also forejudged of his trade that he should not use that trade again as a master workman. This judgment must have been at common law. (c)

The offences of counterfeiting the assay marks on bullion or plate, or transposing such marks from one piece of manufacture to another, will be mentioned in a subsequent part of the work.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OF THE MAKING, MENDING, OR HAVING IN POSSESSION ANY INSTRUMENTS FOR COINING.

Making, mending, or having possession of any coining tools, felony.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 24, 'Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall knowingly make or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or buy or sell, or have in his custody or possession, any puncheon, counter-puncheon, matrix, stamp, die, pattern or mould, in or upon which there shall be made or impressed, or which will make or impress, or which shall be adapted and intended to make or impress, the figure, stamp, or apparent resemblance of both or either of the sides of any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, or of any coin of any foreign prince, state, or country, or any part or parts of both or either of such sides; or shall make or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or shall buy or sell, or have in his custody or possession, any edger, edging or other tool, collar, instrument, or engine adapted and intended for the marking of coin round the edges with letters, grainings, or other marks or figures apparently resembling those on the edges of any such coin as in this section aforesaid, knowing the same to be so adapted and intended as aforesaid; or shall make or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or shall buy or sell, or have in his custody or possession, any press for coinage, or any cutting engine for cutting by force of a screw or of any other contrivance, round blanks out of gold, silver, or other metal or mixture of metals, or any other machine, knowing such press to be a press for coinage, or knowing such engine or machine to have been used, or to be intended to be used, for or in order to the false making or counterfeiting of any such coin as in this section aforesaid, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (a)

This clause is framed from the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 10, and is extended to tools for making foreign coin, and to other tools and machines than those mentioned in the former enactment, and to tools for cutting blanks out of mixed metals.

Where two galvanic batteries were found in the prisoner's house, with white metal and other things plainly indicating that they had been used for coining, and it was proved that counterfeit coin is electro-plated before it is put in circulation, and that that is generally done by the aid of galvanic batteries, it was held that the batteries were machines within the meaning of this section. (b)

Sec. 25. 'Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall knowingly convey out of any of Her Majesty's mints any puncheon, counter-puncheon, matrix, stamp, die, pattern, mould, edger, edging or other tool, collar, instrument, press, or engine used or employed in or about the coining of coin, or any useful part of any of the several matters aforesaid, or any coin, bullion, metal, or mixture of metals, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (c)

Conveying tools or monies out of the mint without authority, felony.

Sec. 14. 'Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall knowingly make or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or buy or sell, or have in his custody or possession, any instrument, tool, or engine adapted and intended for the counterfeiting any of the Queen's current copper coin, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years, and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (d)

Making or having copper coining tools.

Several points arose as to the tools or instruments which were within the words of the 8 & 9 Will. 3. Where the prisoner was indicted for having in his custody a press for coinage without any lawful authority, a question was raised whether a press for coinage was one of the tools or instruments within that clause of the Act on which the indictment was founded; and a majority of the judges held that it was. (e) In another case, the prisoner was convicted of having in his custody, without lawful excuse, one mould made of lead, on which was impressed the resemblance of one of the sides of a shilling, viz., the head side of a shilling; and it was submitted to the judges whether the mould found in the prisoner's custody was comprised under the general words 'other tool or instrument before mentioned,' so as to make the unlawful custody of it high treason; and also whether, if it were so comprised, it should not have been laid in the indictment to be a tool or instrument in the words of the Act. And the judges were unanimously of opinion that this mould was a tool or instrument mentioned in the former part of the statute, and therefore comprised under these general words; and that as a mould is expressly mentioned by name in the first clause of the Act which respects the making or mending, it need not be averred to be a tool or instrument so mentioned. (f)

The prisoner was indicted for having in his custody a puncheon made of iron and steel, upon which was impressed the resemblance of the head side of a shilling, without lawful authority, &c. Several puncheons were found in the prisoner's lodgings, together with a quantity of counterfeit money, and he had them knowingly for the purposes of coining. These puncheons were ready for use; but it was impossible to say that the shillings which were found were actually made with these puncheons, the impressions being too faint to be exactly compared; but they had the appearance of having been made with them. The manner of making these puncheons was as follows: a true shilling was cut away to the outline of the head; that outline was fixed on a piece of steel, which was filed or cut close to the outline, and this made the puncheon; the puncheon made the die, which is the counter-puncheon; a puncheon is complete without letters, but it may be made with letters upon it; though from the difficulty and inconvenience it is never so made at the mint; but after the die is struck the letters are engraved on it; a puncheon alone, without the counter-puncheon, will not make the figure; but to make an old shilling or a base shilling current, nothing more is necessary than the instrument now produced. They may be used for other purposes, such as making seals, buttons, medals, or other things, where such impressions are wanted. Eleven of the judges (absente, De Grey, C. J.) were unanimously of opinion that this was a puncheon within the meaning of the Act; for the word 'puncheon' is expressly mentioned in the statutes, and will, by the means of the counter-puncheon or matrix, 'make or impress the figure, stamp, resemblance, or similitude of the current coin;' and these words do not mean an exact figure, but if the instrument impress a resemblance in fact, such as will impose on the world, it is sufficient, whether the letters are apparent on the puncheon or not; otherwise the Act would be quite evaded, for the letters would be omitted on purpose. The puncheon in question was one to impress the head of King William; and the shillings of his reign, though the letters are worn out, are current coin of the kingdom. The puncheon made an impression like them, and the coin stamped with it would resemble them on the head side, though there were no letters. This was compared to the case mentioned

(f) Lennard's case, 1 Leach, 90. 1 East, P. C. c. 4, s. 17, p. 170. Another point was afterwards raised in this case upon the form of the indictment. The doubt was, whether the mould which was found in the prisoner's custody, it having only the resemblance of a shilling inverted, viz. the convex parts of the shilling being concave in the mould, and vice versa, the head or profile being turned the contrary way of the coin, and all the letters of the inscription reversed, was not properly an instrument which would make and impress the resemblance, stamp, &c., rather than an instrument on which the same were made and impressed, as laid in this indictment, the statute seeming to distinguish between such as will make and impress the similitude, &c., as the matrix, die, and mould; and such on which the same is made and impressed, as a puncheon, or counter-puncheon, or pattern. But a great majority of the judges were of opinion that this evidence sufficiently maintained the indictment; because the stamp of the current coin was certainly impressed on the mould in order to form the cavities thereof. They agreed, however, that the indictment would have been more accurate had it charged that 'he had in his custody a mould that would make and impress the similitude,' &c., and in this opinion some, who otherwise doubted, acquiesced.

by Sir Matthew Hale, (g) that the omission or addition of words in the inscription of the true seals, for the purpose of evading the law, would not alter the case. (h)

The part of the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, which related to instruments to mark the edges of coins, was not confined to such instruments as were in use when the Act passed; but extended to newly-invented instruments, which would produce the same effect; and it was not confined to such instruments as, used by the hand, unconnected with any other power, would produce the effect. A collar, therefore, marking the edge of coin, by having the coin forced through it by machinery, is an instrument within the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, though this mode of marking the edges is of modern invention, and though the collar cannot be used by itself, but must be used in conjunction with other machinery. (i)

It was decided, that having a tool or instrument (of such sort as is included in the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26) in possession for the purpose of coining foreign gold coin not current here, was not within that statute; (ii) but it is expressly included in the present clause.

Where a die calculated to make shillings is made by an innocent agent, the party procuring him to make such die is the principal. The prisoner was indicted for feloniously making a die which would impress the resemblance of the obverse side of a shilling. The prisoner applied to a die-sinker to sink dies for counters for two whist clubs, stating that it was their practice to play with counters with one side resembling coins, and that they wished to have counters stamped by dies made under the following directions:—‘Four dies for whist counters, obverse head of Queen Victoria, as in the shilling coin. Reverse, “Blandford Whist Club, established 1800.” Obverse the shilling, as in coin, with wreath, &c. Reverse, “Exeter Whist Club, established 1800.”’ The die-sinker, entertaining suspicions, applied to the agent of the Mint, and communicated the order to him. The agent sent to the officers of the Mint in London, and the die-sinker was by them directed to execute the prisoner’s order. The prisoner afterwards desired to have the obverse of one of the pieces, and the obverse of the other finished first, and they were so. When they were finished, they formed a die for the coining of a shilling. For the prisoner, it was objected that he could not be convicted, as he had not himself done anything in the making of the die, and that he was not answerable in this form of charge for the act of the die-sinker; that the die-sinker having acted under the instructions of the Mint, no felony whatever had been committed, and that the prisoner should have been indicted for a misdemeanor in inciting the die-sinker to commit a felony. But, upon a case reserved, the judges thought the die-sinker an innocent agent, and held the conviction good. (k)

On an indictment for having in possession a die made of iron and steel, proof of a die made of either material will be sufficient; and it seems that if the indictment state that the die was made of iron, steel, and other materials, proof that it was made of any material would be sufficient; and that it would not be necessary even to prove the exact material. The indictment was for having in possession a die made of iron and steel, a witness who saw the die said it was made of iron; another witness, who had not seen it, said that dies were usually made of steel, and that iron dies would not stand; and the judges held that this evidence would support the indictment, for it was immaterial to the offence of what the die was made, and proof of a die either of iron or steel, or both, would satisfy this charge. (l)

It is not necessary to prove money made with the instrument.

Having tools for coining in possession, with intent to use them, is a misdemeanor at common law.

In proceeding upon the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, it was not necessary to prove that money was actually made with the instrument in question. (m)

The having tools for coining in possession, with intent to use them, is a misdemeanor at common law. An indictment, which was framed as for a misdemeanor at common law, charged that the defendant, without any lawful authority, had in his custody and possession two iron stamps, each of which would make and impress the figure, resemblance, and similitude of one of the sceptres impressed upon the current gold coin of this kingdom, called half-guineas, with intent to make the impression of sceptres on divers pieces of silver coin of this realm, called sixpences, and to colour such pieces of the colour of gold, and fraudulently to utter them as lawful half-guineas. Lord Hardwicke, at the assizes, doubted whether the bare possession was unlawful, unless made use of, or unless made criminal by statute; but upon the indictment being removed into the Court of King's Bench by certiorari, (n) Page, Probyn, and Lee, justices, held, that the bare having such instruments in possession, with the intent charged, was a misdemeanor. (o)

The tool or instrument need not bear an exact resemblance to the coin.

It seems that the degree of similitude to the real coin which the tools or instruments must be capable of impressing in order to bring the case within the statute, must be governed by considerations similar to those which have been stated with respect to the counterfeit coin itself. (p) Whether the instrument in question be calculated to impress the figure, stamp, resemblance, or similitude of the coin current is a question for the jury; and it is clear, that the offence is not confined to an exact imitation of the original and proper effigies of the coin. (q)

If an indictment charge that the prisoner had possession of a mould, having the resemblance of a shilling on it, it must be proved that the mould had the

Upon an indictment which alleges that a prisoner feloniously had in his possession a mould having the resemblance of the obverse side of a shilling impressed upon it, it must be proved that the entire impression was upon the mould. The prisoner was charged in one count with having in his possession a mould, 'upon which was impressed the figure and apparent resemblance of one of the sides (that is to say) the obverse side of the King's current coin called a shilling,' and in another count the word 'reverse' was substituted for 'obverse;' the moulds when produced appeared not to have a complete impression of the obverse and reverse sides of a shilling, but only the outside rim, and a slight portion of the other parts of the impression, the entire impressions, however, appeared to have been upon them at one time, but part had been obliterated. It was held, that if the jury believed that no more than part of the impression was impressed upon the moulds while the prisoner was in possession of them, that he ought to be acquitted. (r) But where an indictment charges that the prisoner made a mould, which was intended to impress the resemblance of the obverse side of a shilling, it is sufficient to prove that the prisoner made a mould, which would make a part of the impression. One count charged the prisoner with making a mould, 'which said mould was intended to make and impress the figure and apparent resemblance' of the obverse side, and another the reverse side, of a shilling: the evidence being the same as in the former case; it was held, that the term 'intended' did not mean in a state to make an entire impression, and therefore if the prisoner had only begun to make, the intention to make the whole might be inferred, though only part was actually made, and consequently that the evidence was sufficient. (s)

But where upon an indictment for having in possession a mould, upon which was made the figure of one of the sides of a shilling, it appeared that the mould had a perfect impression on one side of it; but that there was no channel, through which the metal runs, and the previous case was cited; Maule, J., held that a mould must be a thing by means of which a person may be able to make a coin; and that a thing, by means of which coin cannot be made, cannot be a mould; for it requires something to be done to make it a mould. The proof, therefore, was insufficient. As to the words 'any part or parts' contained in the clause, they did not refer to any part of the mould, but to any part of the impression. (t)

Where a mould was made to resemble the whole of one side of a coin, which had been worn partly away by use, an indictment under the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 10, might charge the possession of a mould on which was impressed the figure of one of the sides of such coin, as the words 'part or parts' of the sides in that section applied to cases where several moulds were used to make one side of a coin. (u)

An indictment charging that the prisoner had in his possession a mould 'upon which was made and impressed the figure' of one of the sides of a coin, is bad for not showing that the figure was on the mould at the time when the prisoner had it in his possession. The words 'then and there' should be introduced before the word 'made.' (u)

Weeks and two other men and two women were indicted for having in their possession a mould impressed with one side of a half-crown. Weeks had occupied a house for a month, and the police one night went to the house and found the other prisoners there. The men attacked the police, whilst the women snatched up something which they threw into the fire. The police preserved entire impression of a shilling on it.

But if an indictment charge that the prisoner made a mould intended to impress the resemblance of a shilling, it is sufficient to prove that he made a mould which will make part of the impression.

A mould must be complete to support an indictment for having possession of a mould.

part of this, which proved to be fragments of a plaster of Paris mould of a half-crown, parts of which were still wet. Weeks shortly afterwards came to the house. The women called out to him that the police were there. He nevertheless came in. The house had two rooms on each floor, and a quantity of plaster of Paris was found in a cupboard up stairs, with several bottles of liquid. In a cupboard down stairs an iron ladle, such as might have been used for melting metal, was found: on the hearth in one of the rooms up stairs was found a small portion of white metal and some fragments of plaster of Paris moulds. Thirteen days before Weeks had passed a bad half-crown; but there was no evidence to show that it was made in the mould found in the house. The jury found that Weeks knew that the mould was in his house. It was held that Weeks was rightly convicted, as the mould was found in the house of which he was the master, and that the evidence of the uttering of the half-crown by him was rightly admitted to establish the scienter. (v)

Mould found in a house where father, mother, and boy lived.

On an indictment against husband, wife and boy aged ten years, for having in possession a mould on which was impressed the obverse side of a shilling, it appeared that the boy was apprehended whilst passing a counterfeit half-crown, and on the officer going to the house where he said he resided the husband was found in an upper room. In the lower room the mould and various coining implements were found, and whilst the officer was searching the wife came in, and soon afterwards broke up a mould used in casting counterfeit shillings; on her counterfeit money was found, but none on her husband. Talfourd, J., held that as the husband occupied the room in which the mould was found, primâ facie he must be presumed to be in possession of what the room contained; but that presumption might be rebutted, and the jury must consider all the circumstances, and see whether they satisfied them that the trade was carried on there with his sanction. If they were satisfied that the husband was in possession of the mould, they ought to acquit the wife, as she could not in law be said to have any possession separate from her husband; but if they thought that the criminality was on her part alone, and that he was entirely guiltless of any participation in her conduct, she might be convicted. If they thought she broke the mould to screen him from detection, that would not affect the case. Either husband or wife might be convicted on this evidence, but not both. As to the boy, it would be going too far to say that he was a joint possessor with either of his parents. (w)

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

OF UTTERING, TENDERING, &c., COUNTERFEIT COIN.

IN some cases formerly the putting off counterfeit money might amount to treason: as if A. counterfeited the gold or silver coin current, and by agreement before that counterfeiting B. was to take off and vent the counterfeit money, B. was an aider and abettor to such counterfeiting, and consequently a principal traitor within the law. (a) And in the case of the copper coin, B. acting a similar part was an accessory before the fact to the felony, within the statute 11 Geo. 3, c. 40 (now repealed). (b). And if B., knowing that A. had counterfeited money, put off this false money for him after the fact, without any such agreement precedent to the counterfeiting, he seems to be as a receiver of A. because he maintains him. (c)

In some cases treason formerly.

If A. counterfeited money, and B. knowing the money to be counterfeited vented the same for his own benefit, B. was neither guilty of treason, nor misprision of treason. But he might be proceeded against under the 15 Geo. 2, c. 28 (now repealed), before which statute he was only liable to be punished as for a cheat and misdemeanor. (d) Where the defendant was indicted for 'unlawfully uttering and tendering in payment to T. H. ten counterfeit halfpence, knowing them to be counterfeit,' and convicted on a count laying this generally, upon reference to all the judges they held it was not an indictable offence. (e) And upon the principles which have been mentioned in a former part of this work, (f) the unlawful procuring of counterfeit coin with intent to circulate it, though no act of uttering be proved, is a misdemeanor: and the possession of counterfeit coin unaccounted for was held to be evidence of an unlawful procurement with intent to circulate. Sec. 11. Sec. 12. 'Whosoever having been convicted, either before or after the passing of this Act, of any such misdemeanor or crime and offence as in any of the last three preceding sections mentioned, or of any felony or high crime and offence against this or any former Act relating to the coin, shall afterwards commit any of the misdemeanors or crimes and offences in any of the said sections mentioned, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (1)

Every second offence of uttering, &c., after a previous conviction, shall be felony.

This clause is taken from the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, ss. 7, 8, but those sections only applied to offences committed after a conviction for a misdemeanor: but it was expedient to extend the clause to convictions after a previous conviction for felony; for such previous conviction rendered the offender deserving of at least as high a punishment as if he had been previously convicted of any misdemeanor mentioned in any of the three preceding sections, and it sometimes happened that it was easier to prove a previous conviction for felony than for such a misdemeanor; as the former might have taken place in the same county where the subsequent offence was committed, but not the latter.

Sec. 37. 'Where any person shall have been convicted of any offence against this Act, or any former Act relating to the coin, and shall afterwards be indicted for any offence against this Act committed subsequent to such conviction, it shall be sufficient in any such indictment, after charging such subsequent offence, to state the substance and effect only (omitting the formal part) of the indictment and conviction for the previous offence; and a certificate containing the substance and effect only (omitting the formal part) of the indictment and conviction for the previous offence, purporting to be signed by the clerk of the court or other officer having or purporting to have the custody of the records of the court where the offender was first convicted, or by the deputy of such clerk or officer, shall, upon proof of the identity of the person of the offender, be sufficient evidence of the previous conviction, without proof of the signature or official character or authority of the person appearing to have signed the same, or of his custody or right to the custody of the records of the court, and for every such certificate a fee of six shillings and eightpence, and no more, shall be demanded or taken; and the proceedings upon any indictment for committing any offence after a previous conviction or convictions shall be as follows; (that is to say), the offender shall, in the first instance, be arraigned upon so much only of the indictment as charges the subsequent offence, and if he plead not guilty, or if the Court order a plea of not guilty to be entered on his behalf, the jury shall be charged, in the first instance, to inquire concerning such subsequent offence only; and if they find him guilty, or if on arraignment he plead guilty, he shall then, and not before, be asked whether he had been previously convicted as alleged in the indictment, and if he answer that he had been so previously convicted, the Court may proceed to sentence him accordingly, but if he deny that he had been so previously convicted, or stand mute of malice, or will not answer directly to such question, the jury shall then be charged to inquire concerning such previous conviction or convictions, and in such case it shall not be necessary to swear the jury again, but the oath already taken by them shall for all purposes be deemed to extend to such last-mentioned inquiry; Provided that if upon the trial of any person for any such subsequent offence such person shall give evidence of his good character, it shall be lawful for the prosecutor, in answer thereto, to give evidence of the conviction of such person for the previous offence or offences, before such verdict of guilty shall be returned, and the jury shall inquire concerning such previous conviction or convictions at the same time that they inquire concerning such subsequent offence.'

This clause is principally new. Under the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, it was necessary in an indictment for a subsequent offence, to set out at length the previous indictment, &c., and to give in evidence a copy of that indictment, &c.: this was very objectionable, and therefore this clause has provided for a short statement in the indictment, and for a certificate containing the substance and effect of the former indictment, &c.; it has also provided for the proceedings on the arraignment, and in the same manner as on an indictment for larceny after a previous conviction for felony.

The words 'after charging the subsequent offence' were inserted in order to render it absolutely necessary always to charge the subsequent offence or offences first in the indictment, and after so doing to allege the previous conviction or convictions. This was the invariable practice on the Oxford Circuit, and the Select Committee of the Commons were clear that it ought to be universally followed, so that the previous conviction should not be mentioned, even by accident, before a verdict of guilty of the subsequent offence had been delivered.

The proceedings on the arraignment and trial are now to be as follows:

Mode of proceeding.

The defendant is first to be arraigned on that part only of the indictment which charges the subsequent offence; that is to say, he is to be asked whether he be guilty or not guilty of that offence. If he plead not guilty, or if the Court order a plea of not guilty to be entered for him under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, s. 2, or 9 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 8 (I.), where he stands mute or will not answer directly to the charge, then the jury are to be charged in the first instance to try the subsequent offence only. If they acquit of that offence, the case is at an end; but if they find him guilty of the subsequent offence, or if he plead guilty to it on arraignment, then the defendant is to be asked whether he has been previously convicted as alleged, and if he admit that he has, he may be sentenced accordingly; but if he deny it, or stand mute of malice, or will not answer directly to such question, then the jury are to be charged to try whether he has been so previously convicted, and this may be done without swearing them again, and then the previous conviction is to be proved in the same manner as before this Act passed. (m)

A doubt has been raised as to the mode of proceeding where a prisoner is indicted after this Act came into operation for an offence against the former Act. Where the prisoner was indicted for feloniously uttering counterfeit coin on the 19th of October, 1861, after a previous conviction, and tried in the November following, the Recorder and Common Serjeant held that the proceedings at the trial must be as before the new Act passed (n). But where the same question arose in an ordinary case of felony, Byles, J., was of opinion that, as far as the offence was concerned, the offence was governed by the former statute; but as to the procedure at the trial, that was to be regulated by the Act which was in force at the time of the trial. (o) But Martin, B., is said to have subsequently held that the former view was correct. (p)

When the subsequent offence was before the new Act.

It is clear from the terms of the clause that the certificate is admissible, if it be apparently regularly framed, without any additional evidence.

The certificate needs no proof.

Two cases are reported, in which it is said that Cresswell, J., held that, where a certificate was produced purporting to be signed by a clerk of the peace, there must be some evidence in addition that the certificate is genuine and comes from the proper custody, as by proof of the handwriting, or that the document came from the office of the clerk of the peace. (q)

The proviso as to giving evidence of the previous conviction, if the prisoner give evidence of his good character, remains unaltered.

If the prisoner, whether by himself or his counsel, attempts to prove a good character for honesty, either directly, by calling witnesses, or indirectly, by cross-examining the witnesses for the Crown, the prosecution may give the previous conviction in evidence against the prisoner. (r) If, however, a witness for the prosecution were asked by the prisoner's counsel some question, which has no reference to character, and he happened to say something favourable to the prisoner's character, the prisoner would not be said to give evidence as to his character, and the previous conviction ought not to be admitted. (p) Anonymous, ibid. It seems quite clear that Byles, J., fell into a misapprehension. The old Acts are all kept alive by sec. 3 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95, as to all offences committed before the 1st of Nov. 1861, and that section, in addition, expressly provides that every such offence 'shall be dealt with, tried,' &c., in the same manner as if the repealing Act had not passed; and sec. 37 of the Coin Act and sec. 116 of the Larceny Act provide in the commencement for the indictment for offences against those Acts, and the subsequent parts of those sections ought to be held to apply to those cases only. See the note, Greaves' Cr. Acts, 199, 2nd edit.

A fourpenny-piece is well described as a groat.

The prisoner was indicted for uttering a counterfeit coin intended to resemble a piece of the current coin called a groat. All the witnesses called the coin a fourpenny-piece, except the Inspector for the Mint, who called it a groat, and said it had had that name, he believed, from the earliest period. It had the word 'fourpence' upon it, but the original name was groat in the time of Edward III. They were not then the same size and weight as this. He had heard them called groats; they were called groats as well as fourpenny pieces in the proclamation. It was contended for the prisoner that the coin was not proved by legal evidence to be a groat, the proclamation not having been produced. Maule, J., Erskine, J., being present, in summing up, said: 'A groat is a common word belonging to our own mother tongue, such as "uttering," "public-house," "half-pint," and many other expressions; and you are here as Englishmen to use your own knowledge of your own language; and if, understanding the matter without any evidence, you are satisfied that a fourpenny-piece and a groat are the same thing, then the prisoner is rightly indicted. It is very true that a groat in Edward the Third's time weighed a great deal more than a fourpenny-piece does now; and so it is with respect to other coins. Things have kept their names, though they have changed their value.' (u)

What was a putting off counterfeit money within 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26.

Under the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, s. 6, which had only the words 'take, receive, pay, or put off,' there must have been an actual passing or getting rid of the money, and not merely an attempt to do so. The prisoner had carried a large quantity of counterfeit shillings to the house of a Mrs. Levey, which she agreed to receive from him, and which he agreed to put off to her at the rate of twenty-nine shillings for every guinea. In pursuance of this bargain, the prisoner laid a heap of counterfeit shillings on a table, and Mrs. Levey proceeded to count them out at the rate before-mentioned: and had counted out three parcels, containing eighty-seven counterfeit shillings, for which she was to pay the prisoner three guineas; but before she had paid him, and while the counterfeit money lay upon the table, the officers entered the room and apprehended them. Mrs. Levey swore that she had bought the three parcels of shillings, and was going to pay the prisoner three guineas for them at the moment they were detected. This was ruled not to be a completion of the offence charged, and the prisoner was acquitted. (v)

(v) Wooldridge's case, 1 Leach, 307. 1 East, P. C. c. 4, s. 27, p. 179. I have left this case, as it might be useful if an indictment omitted the word 'tender.' C. S. G.

But this case would clearly be within the new Act, which has the word 'tender' in it.

Upon an indictment under the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 7, for 'uttering and putting off' a counterfeit shilling, it appeared that the prisoner went into a shop and asked to purchase some coffee and sugar, and in payment of the same he put on the counter the coin in question, when the shopkeeper took up the coin and told the prisoner it was a bad one. The prisoner then left the shop, leaving the shilling behind him, but without the coffee and sugar, and it was held that the charge of uttering and putting off was proved by the evidence. (w)

If the names of the persons to whom the money was put off can be ascertained, they ought to be mentioned, and laid severally in the indictment: but if they cannot be ascertained, the same rule will apply which prevails in the case of stealing the property of persons unknown. (x)

The words of the 15 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 2, 'utter or tender in payment' being in the disjunctive, were held to apply to an uttering of counterfeit money, though not tendered in payment, but passed by the common trick called ringing the changes. The prosecutor having bargained with the prisoner, who was selling fruit about the streets, to have five apricots for sixpence, gave him a good shilling to change. The prisoner put the shilling into his mouth, as if to bite it in order to try its goodness; and, returning a shilling to the prosecutor, told him it was a bad one. The prosecutor gave him another good shilling, which he also affected to bite, and then returned another shilling, saying it was not a good one. The prosecutor gave him another good shilling, with which he practised this trick a third time; the shillings returned by him being in every instance bad. The Court held that the words of the statute were sufficient to include this case; and that uttering and tendering in payment were two distinct and independent acts. (y)

It was once held that the uttering must either be with intent to defraud the party receiving the money, or with intent that that party should pass it as the agent of the utterer. Upon an indictment on 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 7, against husband and wife for uttering a counterfeit half-crown, it appeared that a woman asked the female prisoner to give her something, as her children were without food, and the male prisoner gave her twopence, and told her that his wife would give her something more, on which she gave the woman the bad half-crown in question, telling her to get what she could for her children; it was held that, although in the statute there are no words with respect to defrauding, yet in the proof it is necessary to go beyond the mere words of the statute, and to show an intention to defraud some person. There might be cases of a party giving a person a piece of counterfeit money, and at the same time telling that person that it was bad, and yet he would still be liable to be convicted on an indictment like the present, if a case falling within the mere words of the statute were sufficient. (z)

But where on an indictment for uttering counterfeit coin, it appeared that the prisoner had given the coin to a girl with whom he had had connection, Lord Denman, C. J., and Coltman, J., held that if the prisoner gave the coin to the girl under the circumstances proved, knowing it to be counterfeit, he was guilty of the offence charged; that the preceding decision was not in point, as that was a case of charity; but that there were great doubts as to the correctness of that ruling. (a) And Reg. v. Page (b) is said to have been overruled, and that 'the intent is inferred by law,' in like manner as 'if a forged instrument is put away in order to get money or credit, that amounts to an uttering.' (c)

Where the indictment charged two utterings on the same day, each in a different count the court could not pronounce the greater punishment of the third section of the 15 Geo. 2, c. 28.

But where two utterings on a certain day named are charged in one count, the fact will be sufficiently averred.

An indictment on the 15 Geo. 2, c. 28, charged the prisoner in the first count with having, on the 15th December, uttered to one G. S. a counterfeit half-crown, knowing it to be so; and in the second count with having, on the said 15th December, uttered another counterfeit half-crown to the same person; and the prisoner was convicted on both counts. The question was whether the uttering the counterfeit money twice on the same day being stated in the two counts, the Court could pronounce the greater punishment inflicted by the third section of the statute, or must give only the smaller punishment inflicted by the second section; and the judges held that this indictment was not sufficient to subject the prisoner to the larger penalty, as for uttering two pieces of counterfeit coin on the same day, there being no distinct averment of that fact. (d) But where two utterings are charged in one count of the indictment, on a certain day therein named, the day will be held to be material, and the fact of an uttering twice on the same day to be sufficiently averred. The indictment charged that the prisoner on the 14th of February, uttered base coin to W. C.; and that on the said 14th February he uttered to J. L. other base coin, and it was held sufficient to warrant the higher punishment; the utterings, on the face of the indictment, appearing to be on the same day. And the judges held, that though, when the day is not material, the fact may be proved on a day different from the day laid, yet where the day is not indifferent, the precise time laid must be proved: and that in this case it must be taken that it was proved that the defendant uttered counterfeit coin at two different times of the same day. On a conviction of two separate utterings, in two counts, one judgment of two years' imprisonment under sec. 7 of the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, is bad. The first count charged the prisoner with uttering on the 2nd of December a counterfeit shilling; the second count charged him with uttering another counterfeit shilling on the same day and at the same place, and he was convicted of both utterings, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment, and, upon a case reserved, the judges were of opinion that the sentence was incorrect, and that there should have been consecutive judgments of one year's imprisonment each. (f)

For the purpose of proving the act charged in the indictment to have been done knowingly, it is the practice to receive proof of more than one uttering committed by the party about the same time, though only one uttering be charged in the indictment. This is in conformity with the practice upon indictments for disposing of and putting away forged bank notes, knowing them to be forged; (g) upon one of which the counsel for the prisoners, objecting to such evidence, contended that it would not be allowed upon an indictment for uttering bad money; and stated that the proof in such case was always exclusively confined to the particular uttering charged in the indictment. But Mr. B. Thomson said, that he by no means agreed in the conclusion of the prisoner's counsel, that the prosecutor could not give evidence of another uttering on the same day to prove the guilty knowledge. 'Such other uttering,' he observed, 'cannot be punished until it has become the subject of a distinct and separate charge; but it affords strong evidence of the knowledge of the prisoner that the money he uttered was bad. If a man utter a bad shilling, and fifty other bad shillings are found upon him, this would bring him within the description of a common utterer: (h) but if the indictment do not contain that charge, yet these circumstances may be given in evidence on any other charge of uttering, to show that he uttered the money with a knowledge of its being bad.' (i) So, upon an indictment for uttering a counterfeit shilling, the fact of five other counterfeit shillings having been found in the prisoner's possession five days afterwards, has been held admissible in order to show guilty knowledge. (k)

In order to prove guilty knowledge, both previous and subsequent utterings of the same and of different kinds of coin are admissible. On an indictment for uttering a counterfeit half-crown on the 12th of December, that uttering was proved, and the uttering of another counterfeit half-crown on the 11th of December, and evidence was admitted of an uttering of a counterfeit shilling on the 4th of January, although it was objected that a subsequent uttering of a different species of counterfeit coin was not admissible to show guilty knowledge at a prior time; and it was held that this evidence was properly received. In order to show guilty knowledge, it would not be sufficient merely to prove some other dishonest act; but here the uttering of the bad silver was so connected with the offence charged, as to make the evidence of it admissible, although the coin was of a different denomination; and the difference of the denomination goes to the weight of the evidence, but does not affect its admissibility. Associate not co-operating.

An associate, not present nor co-operating at an uttering of bad money, is not liable to be convicted with the actual utterer, merely on the ground that he is an utterer also, and has other bad money about him for the purpose of uttering. And it appears not to be a sufficient ground for convicting a person of the second offence, of having other bad money in possession at the time, that such person was associating with another, not present at the uttering, who had large quantities of bad money about him for circulation; or that such person on the day after the uttering had in possession a small number of pieces of bad money. The prisoners, Job and Sarah Else, were indicted for uttering a bad shilling, having other bad shillings in their possession at the time. It appeared that the uttering was by the woman alone, on the 30th of January, in the absence of the man; that they both slept together on the 29th and 31st; and that on the 30th the man offered for sale a large quantity of bad shillings and sixpences; and also that they were both searched on the 31st, when upon the man was found a large quantity of bad shillings, and upon the woman were found six bad shillings. The prisoners were upon this evidence both convicted of the double offence, on the ground that, both being engaged in the same illegal traffic, the act of one was the act of both; but the judges held the woman alone liable to be convicted, and that of the single offence only. Coleridge said he thought the true principle was, whether the one prisoner was so near to the other as to help the other to get rid of the money, which he did not think the evidence proved in this case. In consequence of note (n), Rex v. Else and Rex v. Page were first doubted, and then overruled; and in these cases it is now settled that all who, previously to the uttering of base coin, concert, arrange, or cause its uttering, are equally guilty with the utterer, though absent when the coin is uttered.

Some of the preceding cases are overruled.

The first count charged the prisoners with uttering a counterfeit sixpence to A., and on the same day uttering another to B.; the second count with uttering to C.; and a third count with uttering to D. The prisoners were in a town together all the day in question, and in the evening quitted a public-house together, having first changed their clothes for the purpose of disguise. Each of them uttered way, viz., charging as principal or laying it special, as it will appear on the evidence. In all these cases of uttering the evidence would certainly have satisfied a jury, if the case had been a felony, that the party absent was an accessory, and therefore it should seem he was a principal in the misdemeanor. If that be so, the indictments charging with the actual uttering were right, because that is charging according to the legal effect of the offence. In 12 Co. 81, it was held that if one, before the act done, procure another to counterfeit the great seal, in the indictment he may be charged with the fact, viz., the counterfeiting. [Since the last edition, it has been held on an indictment charging two prisoners with attempting to set fire to a malthouse, that one of them who was absent at the time the attempt was made might be convicted if he procured the other to make the attempt; Reg. v. Clayton, 1 C. & K. 128; and, on an indictment for obtaining money by false pretences, that a party who procured and assisted in the fraud might be convicted, though not present at the time of making the pretence or obtaining the money, for 'in misdemeanors all parties are principals, whether present or not,' Reg. v. Moland, 2 M.C.C.R. 276.] Unless, therefore, the misdemeanor of uttering base coin is to be distinguished from all other misdemeanors, these cases deserve reconsideration, and the more so, because if they are good law the utterer alone can be convicted, while the party in the distance, who generally is the more guilty, will altogether escape. He cannot be convicted as principal, because he is absent, nor as accessory, because in misdemeanors there are no accessories. In Rex v. Roderick, 7 C. & P. 795, Mr. B. Parke expressly declared that when an offence was made a misdemeanor by statute, it was made so for all purposes; and surely there can be no good reason for introducing an exception, the effect of which is to give perfect impunity to guilty parties. The only cases referred to in Rex v. Else were Rex v. Soares, R. & R. C. C. R. 25, and Rex v. Davis, ibid. 113; both cases of felony. C. S. G.

three bad sixpences, made in the same mould, and of the same metal, to shopkeepers living within a short space of each other, and the prisoners were found together immediately afterwards with counterfeit money on their persons, but there was no proof that they were together at either of the utterings. There were other facts to show a community of purpose. On these facts, Erskine, J., at first called on the counsel for the prosecution to elect as to which of the prisoners he intended to proceed; but it was contended that if the prisoners jointly provided themselves with the coin for uttering, and shared the proceeds afterwards, they were jointly guilty of each act of uttering; that in misdemeanor there being no accessories, the acts which would make them accessories before the fact in felony made them principals on this charge, and that at all events one of them could be convicted of the two utterings on the same day, and the other of the single uttering, of which he was guilty, on one of the other counts. Erskine, J., then directed the trial to proceed, and in summing up told the jury that if two persons, having jointly prepared counterfeit coin, planned the uttering, and went on a joint expedition, and uttered, in concert and by previous arrangement, the different pieces of coin, then the act of one would be the act of both, though they might not be proved to be actually together at each uttering. It might be different if, having possession of the counterfeit coin, they shared it between them, and each went his own way, and acted independently of the other. If they thought they were acting in concert in the utterings charged, they should convict on the whole indictment. If they thought they were uttering independently of each other, they might convict one of the two utterings on the first count, and the other on the other counts. (q)

All persons engaged in the common purpose of uttering base coin are equally criminal, though absent at the time of the uttering by one of them.

So where, on an indictment against Greenwood and Johnson for a misdemeanor in uttering counterfeit coin, it appeared that the uttering was by Johnson in the absence of Greenwood; but that both were together before the uttering, each offering counterfeit shillings of the same description with that uttered by Johnson; that they both brought food purchased with the proceeds of such utterings to a common lodging; and that Greenwood was taken on the same evening with a counterfeit shilling of the same mould in his possession, and with eight good sixpences and five four-penny pieces, which left no doubt of their joint engagement in a common purpose of uttering base shillings and sharing in the proceeds; Talfourd, J., directed the jury, that if they thought Greenwood was engaged on the evening in question with Johnson in the common purpose of uttering counterfeit shillings, having one stock of such coin, for their mutual benefit; and if, in pursuance of such purpose, Johnson uttered the shilling, they ought to find Greenwood guilty, subject to the question of law whether the actual presence of Greenwood, or so near neighbourhood as to amount to association in the very act, was necessary to support the charge. The jury found both guilty; but, in deference to the authority of Rex v. Else (r) and Rex v. Page, (s) the question whether Greenwood was properly convicted was reserved for the opinion of the judges; and they were unanimously of opinion that he was rightly convicted. At common law persons who in felony would have been accessories before the fact, in misdemeanor were principals, and therefore the cases of Rex v. Else and Reg. v. Page were wrongly decided. (t)

Where one of two persons utters base coin, and other base coin is found on the other, they are jointly guilty of the aggravated offence under sec. 10 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, if they are acting in concert, and the one knows of the possession of the base coin by the other; for by the interpretation clause the having any coin in possession includes 'the knowing and wilfully having it in the actual custody or possession of any other person'; and as it is clear that under that clause a man may have possession of coin in a house or other place, though he is far away, so the possession of coin by one man may be the possession of another within that clause, though they are at a great distance from each other. (u)

Where two persons act in concert, the possession of coin by one is the possession of the other.

On an indictment on the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 8 (now repealed), for having in possession counterfeit crowns and half-crowns with intent to utter the same, it appeared that there were found in different pockets of the prisoner's dress four counterfeit crowns, all electro-plated, of the same date and same mould, each wrapped in a separate piece of paper; thirteen counterfeit half-crowns, all electro-plated, of the same date and the same mould, each wrapped in a separate piece of paper; and fourteen counterfeit shillings, all electro-plated, of the same date and the same mould. The prisoner said that they had been given him while gambling, and that he did not know that they were counterfeit: and it was held that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury that he knew that the coin was counterfeit, and intended to utter it. (v)

The word 'knowing' in indictments for uttering coin sufficiently applies to the time and place of uttering, and no addition of time or place is necessary. The word 'knowing' refers to the prisoner, and not to the person, to whom the coin was uttered, although that person's name immediately precedes the word 'knowing.' It is sufficient, in an indictment for a felony for uttering base coin after a previous conviction, to state that the prisoner was in due form of law tried and convicted by a jury.

Form of indictment.

It is no objection that an indictment for felony, for uttering base coin after a previous conviction, states that the prisoner, together with another person, was tried and convicted; and the record of the former trial shows the conviction of the prisoner and the acquittal of the other person.

Variance.

Where a prisoner was indicted under the 3 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 7, for uttering counterfeit money after a previous conviction, and the indictment alleged that the prisoner, 'together with one T. P., was in due form of law tried and convicted' by a jury upon an indictment against them, for that they did unlawfully utter a shilling 'to A. W., knowing the same to be false,' and thereupon it was considered that the prisoner should be imprisoned for two years; and that the prisoner afterwards feloniously did utter a half-crown 'to T. H., knowing the same to be false.' The copy of the record of the former trial stated the conviction of the prisoner and the acquittal of T. P.: it was objected, 1st. That the indictment was bad for want of an addition of time and place to the allegation of knowledge, which was to be found neither in the recital of the former indictment, nor in the substantive charge on the face of the present indictment; but the learned judge thought that the former indictment was good, being in the words of the statute and after verdict; and that 'knowing' in the present indictment, being a participle in the present tense, must import knowledge at the time of the uttering. 2ndly. That the word 'knowing' did not refer to the prisoner, but to A. W. and T. H.; but the learned judge thought that 'knowing' did refer to the prisoner, as all that was alleged to be done was alleged to be done by him. 3rdly. That the indictment did not state any former conviction, because neither the plea nor the verdict of the jury were recited; but the learned judge thought the allegation that he had been in due course of law tried and convicted, together with a statement of the judgment, was sufficient. 4thly. That the recital of the former record showed a conviction of the prisoner and T. P., whereas the record produced showed that the prisoner alone had been convicted and T. P. acquitted, and therefore there was a variance; the learned judge overruled this objection also, but, entertaining some doubt upon the point, he reserved the case for the opinion of the judges, who held the conviction right. SEC. II.

Of Uttering, Tendering, &c., Foreign Counterfeit Coin, &c.

Penalty for uttering such counterfeit coin.

BY the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 20, 'Whosoever shall tender, utter, or put off any such false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any gold or silver coin of any foreign prince, state, or country, (ww) knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour.' (x)

Second offence of uttering counterfeit foreign coin.

Sec. 21. 'Whosoever, having been so convicted as in the last preceding section mentioned, shall afterwards commit the like offence of tendering, uttering, or putting off any such false or counterfeit coin as aforesaid, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be

(x) This clause is framed from the 37 Geo. 3, c. 126, s. 4, with such alterations in its terms as to make it correspond with the rest of this Act. It is new in Ireland. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 104.

imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement; and who-soever, having been so convicted of a second offence, shall afterwards commit the like offence of tendering, uttering, or putting off any such false or counterfeit coin as aforesaid, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.’ (y)

Third offence.

Sec. 13. ‘Whosoever shall, with intent to defraud, tender, utter, or put off as or for any of the Queen’s current gold or silver coin, any coin not being such current gold or silver coin, or any medal or piece of metal or mixed metals, resembling in size, figure, and colour the current coin as or for which the same shall be so tendered, uttered, or put off, such coin, medal, or piece of metal or mixed metals so tendered, uttered, or put off being of less value than the current coin as or for which the same shall be so tendered, uttered, or put off, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.’

Uttering foreign coin, medals, &c., as current coin, with intent to defraud.

This clause is new. It is intended to meet the cases of uttering foreign coin or medals as and for the current coin of the realm. In order to bring a case within this clause, the coin or medal uttered must be of less value than the coin for which it was uttered, and must have been uttered with intent to defraud. (z)

(y) This clause is framed from the 37 Geo. 3, c. 126, s. 4. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 104. As to the indictment and proceedings, see sec. 37, ante, p. 121. Having in custody a greater number than five pieces of counterfeit foreign coin, whether current here or not, makes the party liable to punishment by proceedings before a justice of the peace, under sec. 23 of the statute.

(z) As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 104. See the interpretation clause, ante, p. 95.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

OF BUYING, SELLING, RECEIVING OR PAYING FOR COUNTERFEIT COIN AT A LOWER RATE THAN ITS DENOMINATION IMPORTS.

Buying or selling, &c., counterfeit gold or silver coin for lower value than its denomination.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 6, ‘Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, or offer to buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen’s current gold or silver coin at or for a lower rate or value than the same imports or was apparently intended to import, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement; and in any indictment for any such offence as in this section aforesaid it shall be sufficient to allege that the party accused did buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, or did offer to buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, the false or counterfeit coin at or for a lower rate or value than the same imports or was apparently intended to import, without alleging at or for what rate, price, or value the same was bought, sold, received, paid, or put off, or offered to be bought, sold, received, paid, or put off.’ (a)

The words ‘without lawful authority,’ &c., were introduced in order to protect officers and others who are authorised to buy or procure false coin in order to detect coiners; under the former enactment every one who bought, &c., false coin was within its words.

The words of the former enactment were ‘the same by its denomination imports, or was coined, or counterfeited for.’ The words in italics have been substituted for them as more appropriately applying to counterfeit coin.

Under the former enactment it was necessary to allege in the indictment, and prove by evidence, the sum for which the coin was bought, &c.; (b) the last part of this clause renders it unnecessary to allege the sum for which the coin was bought, &c., and consequently whatever the evidence on that point may be, there can be no variance between it and the allegation in the indictment, and all that need be proved is that the coin was bought, &c., at some lower rate or value than it imports.

(a) This clause is taken from the 2 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 6. As to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 104. See the interpretation clause, ante, p. 95.

(b) Rex v. Joyce, Carr. Supp. 184; Rex v. Hedges, 3 C. & P. 410.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 14, 'Whosoever shall buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, or offer to buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current copper coin, at or for a lower rate or value than the same imports or was apparently intended to import, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.' (c)

The mere venting of the money was not considered to come within the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, s. 6, unless it were done at a lower value than the coin imported; and it should be so stated in the indictment. (d)

If the names of the persons to whom the money was put off can be ascertained, they ought to be laid in the indictment; but if they cannot be ascertained the same rule applies as in stealing the property of persons unknown. (e)

Buying and selling counterfeit copper coin for lower value than its denomination.

The money must be vented at a lower value.

Names of persons to whom coin is put off to be stated.

(c) This clause is taken from part of sec. 12 of the 2 Will. 4, c. 34. As to the words in italics, see the note to sec. 6, ante, p. 134. As to hard labour, &c., see ante,

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

OF SERVING, OR PROCURING OTHERS TO SERVE FOREIGN STATES.

Serving foreign states, a misdemeanor at common law.

ENTERING into the service of any foreign state without the consent of the King, or contracting with it any other engagement which subjects the party to an influence or control inconsistent with the allegiance due to our own sovereign, is, at common law, a high misdemeanor, and punishable accordingly. (a) Indeed it is considered as so high an offence to prefer the interest of a foreign state to that of our own, that any act is criminal which may but incline a man to do so; as to receive a pension from a foreign prince without the leave of the King. (b)

3 Jac. 1, c. 4,
s. 18, as to subjects going out of the realm to serve.

But with respect to serving, or procuring others to serve, foreign states, provisions have been made by several statutes. The 3 Jac. 1, c. 4, s. 18, which contained provisions against soldiers and other persons going out of the realm to serve foreign states, was repealed by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59. Under that Act it was considered, that if a party went out of the realm with intent to serve a foreign state, although there were no service in fact; or if a party did actually so serve, though he did not go over for that purpose, but upon some other occasion, it was within the statute. Any person without license equipping, &c., or procuring to be equipped, &c., any vessel with intent that it shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince, &c., or to cruise, &c., against any prince, &c., with whom his Majesty shall not be at war, guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sec. 7. 'If any person within any part of the United Kingdom, or in any part of his Majesty's dominions beyond the seas, shall, without the leave and license of his Majesty for that purpose first had and obtained as aforesaid, equip, furnish, fit out, or arm, or attempt or endeavour to equip, furnish, fit out, or arm, or procure to be equipped, furnished, fitted out, or armed, or shall knowingly aid, assist, or be concerned in the equipping, furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any ship or vessel, with intent or in order that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince, state, or potentate, or of any foreign colony, province, or part of any province or people, or of any person or persons exercising or assuming to exercise any powers of government in or over any foreign state, colony, province, or part of any province or people, as a transport or store-ship, or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities against any prince, state, or potentate, or against the subjects or citizens of any prince, state, or potentate, or against the persons exercising or assuming to exercise the powers of government in any colony, province, or part of any province or country, or against the inhabitants of any foreign colony, province, or part of any province or country, with whom his Majesty shall not then be at war; or shall, within the United Kingdom, or any of his Majesty's dominions, or in any settlement, colony, territory, island, or place belonging or subject to his Majesty, issue or deliver any commission for any ship or vessel, to the intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed as aforesaid, every such person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, upon any information or indictment, be punished by fine and imprisonment, or either of them, at the discretion of the Court in which such offender shall be convicted.' Any person without license increasing, &c., or procuring to be increased, the warlike force of any ship, &c., in the service of any foreign prince, &c., guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sec. 8. Any justice of peace residing at or near any port or place within the United Kingdom, where any offence made punishable by this Act as a misdemeanor shall be committed, may issue his warrant for the apprehension of the offender, to bring him before the same or any other justice, who may commit, unless bail is given. Apprehension of offenders.

It is further enacted, that all such offences as shall be committed within that part of the United Kingdom called England, shall be tried in the Court of King's Bench at Westminster, and the venue laid at Westminster, or at the assizes, or session of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, or at any quarter or general sessions of the peace for the county or place where the offence was committed; that when committed in Ireland they shall be prosecuted in the Court of King's Bench at Dublin, and the venue there laid, or at any assizes, &c., for the county or place where the offence was committed; and when committed in Scotland that they shall be prosecuted in the Court of Justiciary, or any other court competent to try criminal offences committed within the county, &c., within which the offence was committed. (f)

mitted within Kingdom.

The statute also provides for the apprehension of offenders, when the offence shall have been committed out of the United Kingdom, and for their trial in any superior Court of his Majesty's dominions competent to try, and having jurisdiction to try, criminal offences, at the place where the offence shall have been committed. (g) And with respect to offences committed out of the United Kingdom, by sec. 9, they may be prosecuted in the Court of King's Bench at Westminster, the venue being laid at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex. CHAPTER THE SEVENTH.

OF SEDUCING SOLDIERS AND SAILORS TO DESERT OR MUTINY.

IN consequence of the attempts of evil-disposed persons, by the publication of written or printed papers, and by malicious and advised speaking, to seduce soldiers and sailors from their duty and allegiance to his Majesty, the 37 Geo. 3, c. 70, was passed, enacting 'that any person who shall maliciously and advisedly endeavour to seduce any person or persons serving in his Majesty's forces by sea or land, from his or their duty and allegiance to his Majesty, or to incite or stir up any such person or persons to commit any act of mutiny, or to make, or endeavour to make, any mutinous assembly, or to commit any traitorous or mutinous practice whatsoever, shall, on being legally convicted of such offence, be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall suffer death, as in cases of felony, without benefit of clergy.' (a) By sec. 3, any person tried, acquitted, or convicted, of any offence against this Act, shall not be liable to be prosecuted again for the same offence or fact, as high treason, or misprision of high treason; and nothing in the Act contained shall prevent the trial of any person who has not been tried for an offence against this Act from being tried for the same as high treason, or misprision of high treason. And by sec. 2, any offence against this Act, whether committed on the high seas or in England, may be prosecuted and tried before any court of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, for any county in England, as if the said offence had been therein committed.

The 1 Vict. c. 91, s. 1, after reciting this Act, provides, 'that if any person shall,' after the 1st of October, 1837, 'be convicted of any of the offences hereinbefore mentioned, such person shall not suffer death, or have sentence of death awarded against him or her for the same, but shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court to be transported (b) beyond the seas for the term of the natural life of such person, or for any term not less than fifteen (c) years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three years.

Sec. 2. 'In awarding the punishment of imprisonment for any offence punishable under this Act, it shall be lawful for the Court to direct such imprisonment to be with or without hard labour in the common gaol or house of correction, and also to direct that

imprisonment.

(a) The Act contains no provision for the punishment of principals in the second degree and accessories; they are, therefore, punishable, the former in the same manner as principals in the first degree, the latter under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, ss. 8, 9, and 1 Vict. c. 90, s. 5, s.e ante, p. 3.

(b) Penal servitude by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 2, ante, p. 4.

(c) Not less than seven years by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 24, s. 1; and not less than three years' penal servitude by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 2, ante, p. 3, 4.

the offender shall be kept in solitary confinement for any portion or portions of such imprisonment, or of such imprisonment with hard labour, not exceeding one month at any one time, and not exceeding three months in any one year, as to the Court in its discretion shall seem meet.⁷

[93] A sailor in a sick hospital, where he had been for thirty days, and who therefore was not entitled to pay, nor liable for what he then did to answer before a court martial, is nevertheless a person serving in his Majesty's forces by sea within this statute, so as to make the seducing him an offence within its provisions. (d)

Indictment.

An indictment upon this statute need not set out the means used for seducing the soldier from his duty and allegiance; and it need not aver that the prisoner knew the person endeavoured to be seduced to be a soldier. It seems also that a double act, namely, that the prisoner endeavoured to incite a soldier to commit mutiny, and also to commit traitorous and mutinous practices, may be charged in one count of the indictment. (e)

The 37 Geo. 3, c. 70, was only temporary; but, after having been continued from time to time by different statutes, was made perpetual (together with an Act upon the same subject, passed at the same time in the Parliament of Ireland,) by the 57 Geo. 3, c. 7.

By the 1 Geo. 1, c. 47, (f) persons persuading or procuring soldiers to desert are subjected to a penalty, and under certain circumstances to imprisonment; and the annual Mutiny Act subjects persons so offending to punishment on summary conviction.

suading, &c.,

The 1 Geo. 1, c. 47, enacts, that if any person (other than enlisted soldiers, against whom it is stated sufficient remedy was already provided by law,) shall, in Great Britain, Ireland, Jersey, or Guernsey, persuade or procure any soldier to desert, he shall forfeit £40, to be recovered by any informer; and if he has not property to that amount, or from the heinous circumstances of the crime it shall be thought proper, the Court before whom he is convicted shall imprison him, not exceeding six months. (g) And the government of the Navy Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 115, s. 13, makes every person who endeavours to seduce from his duty or allegiance any person belonging to the royal navy subject to the Act, and liable to the punishments thereby imposed.

Consequences of desertion to the party deserting.

With respect to the consequences to the party deserting, it may be observed, that desertion in time of war was made a capital crime by 18 Hen. 6, c. 19, enforced by 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 2, s. 6, repealed as to the felony by 1 M. sess. 1, c. 1, revived by 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 3, s. 9, and extended to mariners and gunners by 5 Eliz. c. 5, s. 27. (h) But these statutes are now fallen into disuse, as well on account of the manner of retaining soldiers therein referred to being no longer adopted, as because, since the annual Acts for punishing mutiny and desertion, a more compendious and convenient system of military coercion has obtained. (i) The annual Mutiny Act, reciting that 'no man can be forejudged of life or limb, or subjected in time of peace to any kind of punishment within this realm, by martial law, or in any other manner than by the judgment of his peers, and according to the known and established laws of the realm; yet nevertheless, it being requisite for retaining the forces in their duty that an exact discipline be observed, and that soldiers who shall mutiny, or stir up sedition, or desert, be brought to more exemplary and speedy punishment than the usual form of the law will allow,' enacts, that if any officer or soldier shall, during the continuance of the Act, commit any of the offences therein enumerated, amongst which is desertion, the offender shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall be awarded by a court martial.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

OF PIRACY.

[94] IN treating shortly of this offence, we may consider—I. Of Piracy at common law, and by statutes. II. Of the places in which the offence may be committed. III. Of the court by which it may be tried.

SEC. I.

Of Piracy at Common Law, and by Statutes.

Piracy at common law. THE offence of piracy at common law consists in committing those acts of robbery and depredation upon the high seas which, if committed upon land, would have amounted to felony there. (a) It is not a felony which was triable by jury at common law, but it was only punishable by the civil law before the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15; and this statute, though it makes the offence capital, and provides for the trial of it according to the course of the common law, by the King's special commission, does not make it a felony; therefore, a pardon of all felonies generally does not extend to it. (b)

Piracy by the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 8, as to acts done under the commission of a foreign state. And 18 Geo. 2, c. 30, as to piracy committed under an enemy's commission. The offence of piracy is also provided against by several statutes. The 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 8, enacts, 'that if any of his Majesty's natural-born subjects, or denizens of this kingdom, shall commit any piracy or robbery, or any act of hostility against others his Majesty's subjects, upon the sea, under colour of any commission from any foreign prince or state, or pretence of authority from any person whatsoever, such offender and offenders shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be pirates, felons, and robbers;' and being duly convicted thereof, according to that Act, or the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, shall suffer such pains of death, (c) and loss of lands, goods, and chattels, as pirates, &c., upon the seas ought to suffer. And the 18 Geo. 2, c. 30, enacts, 'that all persons, being natural-born subjects or denizens of his Majesty, who during any

C. c. 17, s. 3, p. 796, where it is said that the offence does not extend to corruption of blood, at least where the conviction is before the Admiralty jurisdiction; though the contrary is holden by great authority upon attainder before commissioners, under the statute of Hen. 8. A fallacy seems to run through some of our books in saying that piracy was not felony at common law; this arose from such expressions as that it was a crime of which the common law did not take notice or cognizance—i.e., which was not triable by jury, the common law mode of trial. See 2 Hale, 18, 370. 1 Hale, 355. Lord Coke says it was felony, Co. Lit. 391 a. 3 Inst. 112. 13 Rep. 51. In 40 Ass. Pl. 25, p. 245, a case of piracy is mentioned where a Norman captain was attainted of felony and hanged. See this case stated, 3 Inst. 21, and 1 Hale, 100.

war shall commit any hostilities upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral or admirals have power, authority, or jurisdiction, against his Majesty's subjects, by virtue or under colour of any commission from any of his Majesty's enemies, or shall be any other ways adherent, or giving aid or comfort to his Majesty's enemies upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral or admirals have power, authority, or jurisdiction, may be tried as pirates, felons, and robbers in the said Court of Admiralty, on ship-board, or upon the land, in the same manner as persons guilty of piracy, felony, and robbery, are by the said Act (d) directed to be tried; and such persons being upon such trial convicted thereof, shall suffer such pains of death, (e) loss of lands, &c., as any other pirates, felons, and robbers ought, by virtue of the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, or any other Act, to suffer.' (f)

The 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 9, enacts, 'that if any commander or master of any ship, or any seaman or mariner, shall, in any place where the admiral hath jurisdiction, betray his trust, and turn pirate, enemy, or rebel, and piratically and feloniously run away with his or their ship or ships, or any barge, boat, ordnance, ammunition, goods or merchandize; or yield them up voluntarily to any pirate; or shall bring any seducing message from any pirate, enemy, or rebel; or consult, combine, or confederate with, or attempt or endeavour to corrupt any commander, master, officer, or mariner, to yield up or run away with any ship, goods or merchandizes, or turn pirates, or go over to pirates; or if any person shall lay violent hands on his commander, whereby to hinder him from fighting in defence of his ship, and goods committed to his trust, (g) or shall confine his master, or make or endeavour to make a revolt in the ship, he shall be adjudged, deemed, and taken to be a pirate, felon, and robber, and being convicted thereof according to the direction of this Act, shall suffer death (e) and loss of lands, goods, and chattels, as pirates, felons, and robbers upon the seas ought to suffer.'

Commanders, seamen, &c., running away with ship or cargo, &c., or yielding voluntarily to pirates, or confederating with them; attempting to corrupt the crew, &c., and persons putting force upon the commander.

By the 8 Geo. 1, c. 24, s. 1, 'in case any person or persons belonging to any ship or vessel whatsoever, upon meeting any merchant ship or vessel on the high seas; or in any port, haven, or creek whatsoever, shall forcibly board or enter into such ship or vessel, and though they do not seize or carry off such ship or vessel, shall throw overboard or destroy any part of the goods or merchandizes belonging to such ship or vessel; the person or persons guilty thereof, shall in all respects be deemed and punished as pirates aforesaid.'

Forcibly entering merchant ships and destroying goods, 8 Geo. 1, c. 24, s. 1, made perpetual by 2 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 7.

The 8 Geo. 1, c. 24, s. 1, enacts 'that if any commander or master of any ship or vessel, or any other person or persons, shall anywise trade with any pirate by truck, barter, exchange, or in any

(f) Sec. 2 contains a proviso that any person tried and acquitted, or convicted according to the Act, shall not be liable to be indicted, &c., again in Great Britain or elsewhere, for the same crime or fact as high treason. But by sec. 3 the Act is not to prevent any offender, who shall not be tried according thereto, from being tried for high treason within this realm, according to the stat. 28 Hen. 8, c. 15.

(g) This last provision is similar to one in the 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 11, s. 9, which is repealed by 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 1, as relates to any mariner laying violent hands on his commander. This statute of Car. 2 contains also some provisions as to yielding without fighting, and as to mariners declining or refusing to fight and defend the ship when commanded by the master.

other manner, or shall furnish any pirate, felon, or robber upon the seas, with any ammunition, provision, or stores of any kind; or shall fit out any ship or vessel knowingly, and with a design to trade with, or supply, or correspond with any pirate, felon, or robber upon the seas; or if any person or persons shall any ways consult, combine, confederate, or correspond with any pirate, felon, or robber on the seas, knowing him to be guilty of any such piracy, felony, or robbery, every such offender and offenders shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of piracy, felony, and robbery.' The Act further provides, that every offender convicted of any piracy, felony, or robbery, by virtue of the Act, shall not be admitted to have the benefit of clergy.' (h)

By the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, dealing in slaves upon the high seas, or in any haven, &c., where the admiral has jurisdiction, except as by that Act is permitted, is made piracy, felony, and robbery, and the offenders made punishable as pirates, felons, and robbers upon the seas. (i)

The 1 Vict. c. 88 (which came into operation on the 1st October, 1837,) (k) repeals so much of the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15; 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7; 4 Geo. 1, c. 11, s. 7; 8 Geo. 1, c. 24, and 18 Geo. 2, c. 30, 'as relates to the punishment of the crime of piracy, or of any offence by any of the said Acts declared to be piracy, or of accessories thereto respectively.'

Sec. 2 enacts, 'That from and after the commencement of this Act whosoever, with intent to commit or at the time of or immediately before or immediately after committing the crime of piracy in respect of any ship or vessel, shall assault, with intent to murder, any person being on board of or belonging to such ship or vessel, or shall stab, cut, or wound any such person, or unlawfully do any act by which the life of such person may be endangered, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall suffer death as a felon.' (l)

Sec. 3. 'From and after the commencement of this Act whosoever shall be convicted of any offence which by any of the Acts hereinbefore referred to amounts to the crime of piracy, and is thereby made punishable with death, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be transported (m) beyond the seas for the term of the natural life of such offender, or for any term not less than fifteen years, (n) or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three years.'

(h) Sec. 4 (but see now 1 Vict. c. 88, infra, as to the punishment), and by sec. 2 every vessel fitted out to trade, &c., with pirates, and also the goods shall be forfeited, half to the Crown and half to the informer. Offenders against this Act are to be tried according to the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, and 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7. In the second edition, the 32 Geo. 3, c. 25, s. 12, was here inserted, but as that Act was only to continue in force during the then war with France, it seems to have expired. See 2 East, P. C. c. 17, s. 7, p. 801 n. (a), and Crabb's Index to the Statutes, C. S. G. The 22 Geo. 3, c. 25, prohibits ransoming any ship belonging to any subject of his Majesty, or goods on board the same, which shall be captured by the subjects of any state at war with his Majesty, or by any persons committing hostilities against his Majesty's subjects.

(l) This sentence may be recorded by the 4 Geo. 4, c. 48, s. 1, and where the indictment charges a stabbing, cutting, or wounding, the jury may acquit of the felony, and convict of the stabbing, cutting, or wounding by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 5, post.

(m) Penal servitude by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 2, ante, p. 4.

(n) Not less than seven years by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 24, s. 1, and not less than three years' penal servitude by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 2, ante, pp. 3, 4.

Sec. 4. 'In the case of every felony punishable under this Act every principal in the second degree and every accessory before the fact shall be punishable with death or otherwise in the same manner as the principal in the first degree is by this Act punishable; and every accessory after the fact to any felony punishable under this Act shall, on conviction, be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years.' Punishment of accessories.

Sec. 5. 'Where any person shall be convicted of any offence punishable under this Act for which imprisonment may be awarded, it shall be lawful for the Court to sentence the offender to be imprisoned, or imprisoned and kept to hard labour, in the common gaol or house of correction, and also to direct that the offender shall be kept in solitary confinement for any portion or portions of such imprisonment, or of such imprisonment with hard labour, not exceeding one month at any one time, and not exceeding three months in any one year, as to the Court in its discretion shall seem meet.' Prior to these statutes (except the statute of Hen. 8), several mariners on board a ship lying near the Groyne seized the captain, he not agreeing with them; and, having put him on shore, carried away the ship, and afterwards committed several piracies. This force upon the captain, and the carrying away the ship, which was explained by the use of it afterwards, was adjudged piracy. (q) But where the master of a vessel loaded goods on board at Rotterdam,

(o) Sec 6 provides that this Act shall not alter the provisions of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 98, and 4 Geo. 4, c. 64.

(p) This statute having repealed the punishment of piracy at common law, which was before punishable by the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, s. 3, with death without benefit of clergy, a difficulty arises as to what is now the punishment for that offence. The 39 Geo. 3, c. 37, s. 1, provides, 'That all and every offence and offences, which, after the passing of this Act, shall be committed upon the high seas out of the body of any county of this realm shall be, and they are hereby declared to be offences of the same nature respectively, and to be liable to the same punishments respectively, as if they had been committed upon the shore, and shall be inquired of, heard, tried, and determined, and adjudged in the same manner as treasons, murders, and conspiracies are directed to be by the same Act' (28 Hen. 8, c. 15, post, p. 153). It should seem, therefore, that this Act, by making all offences committed on sea of the same nature as if they were committed on shore, has made piracy at common law a felony, which it was not at common law, or by the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15 (see ante, p. 144). By the 1 Geo. 4, c. 90, any person found guilty of any capital crime or offence committed upon the sea, which, if committed upon the land would be clergyable, is entitled to the benefit of clergy in like manner as if he had committed such offence upon land. By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, s. 6, clergy was abolished; and by

sec. 7 no person convicted of felony was to suffer death unless for some felony excluded from clergy, on or before the first day of that session of Parliament; and by sec. 12, 'all offences prosecuted in the High Court of Admiralty shall, upon every first and subsequent conviction, be subject to the same punishments, whether of death or otherwise, as if such offences had been committed upon land.' See also the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861, ante, p. 2. By the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 36 (post, p. 158) piracy may now be tried at the Central Criminal Court. By some writers piracy at common law is defined to be the committing those acts of robbery and depredation on sea which, if committed on land, would have amounted to felony. 1 Hawk. c. 37, s. 4. 4 Bla. Com. 72. 2 East, P. C. c. 17, s. 3, p. 796. Mason's case, post, note (r). By others it seems to be considered the same offence as robbery on land. Archb. Vict. Acts, 72. 2 Hale, 369. 1 Hale, 354. 3 Inst. 113, where Lord Coke calls a pirate 'a robber upon the sea.' On the whole it seems that each act of piracy at common law is now a felony of the same kind, and liable to the same punishment, as if the same act had been done upon land, and the offender is triable either under a commission founded on the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, or at the Central Criminal Court, or at the assizes, post, p. 158. Making a re-

It is an offence within the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 9, to make a revolt in a ship, or to endeavour to make one, though the object was not to run away with the ship, or to commit any act of piracy, but to force the captain to redress supposed grievances. The prisoners were charged by the first count of the indictment with betraying their trust and turning pirates, and with confederating piratically and feloniously to steal and run away with the ship; by the second with piratically and feloniously attempting to corrupt other persons of the crew so to steal and run away with the ship; by the third, with piratically and feloniously inciting a revolt in the ship, the master being on board; and, by the fourth, with endeavouring to make such revolt. It appeared clearly that there was a revolt in the ship, and that the prisoners participated, refusing to obey orders, and being guilty of many acts of insubordination and violence. The counsel for the prisoners endeavoured to show, that the prisoners and their adherents had in view a redress of supposed grievances, and not the intention of assuming the command for the purpose of carrying off the ship: and though there was some evidence that the prisoners had an ulterior object than that of redressing ill-usage, of which it appeared they had complained, yet their acquittal upon the two first counts led to the conclusion that the jury did not impute to them any other real intention than that of redressing their supposed grievances. The point submitted to the judges was, that in order to satisfy the intent of the statute, and the words of the indictment, 'piratically and feloniously revolted,' the object of the revolt must have been to take possession of or to run away with the ship, or to enable the prisoners to commit some act of piracy, and not merely to resist the captain's authority in order to force him to redress alleged grievances. But the judges present were unanimously of opinion, that making or endeavouring to make a revolt, with a view to procure a redress of what the prisoners thought grievances, and without any intent to run away with the ship, or to commit any act of piracy, was an offence within the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 9, and that the conviction was therefore right. (s)

A revolt means a rebellion or resistance by several persons to lawful authority.

Where one count charged the prisoners with making, and another with endeavouring to make a revolt in a ship, it appeared that great complaints had been made by the sailors in the course of the voyage about the provisions and the great heat of the cabin where the men had to sleep, which, on account of the fire for cooking, &c., being close to it, was unsupportable in the warm latitudes. On the 30th of September the prisoner M. refused to go on duty, and remained off duty till the following day, when he was again desired to work, and again refused, using at different times violent and threatening language. The captain in consequence ordered the crew to put M. in irons, but instead of obeying him they walked away forward. The prisoner S. had the same morning refused to go to his duty, and he and one G. went towards the captain, who was endeavouring, with the assistance of his officers, to put M. in irons. Violent language was used by both, and threats uttered against the captain, to induce him to alter his determination, and G. rushed to a boat where spears used in the whale-fishery were kept, with the evident intention of seizing one of them, and releasing M. by force. The captain shot G. in the act of laying hold of a spear. Lord Abinger, C. B.: ‘By revolt I understand something like rebellion or resistance to lawful authority, and if the crew of a ship combine together to resist the captain, especially if the object be to deprive him of his authority altogether, it will in my opinion amount to making a revolt. I think upon the construction of this Act of Parliament that the resistance of one person to the authority of the captain would not be a revolt. Revolt means something more than the disobedience of one man. I think it would be straining the evidence rather too far to say that the conduct of these men amounted to a revolt; and the charge of making a revolt, if my construction of the Act be correct, will fall to the ground. The question of whether the ship was properly fitted up and found is not material; for it has been decided that, although there be real grievances to redress, yet it is not an answer to a charge of attempting to make a revolt. If G. and the prisoners were united in some common design to prevent the captain from putting M. in irons, which, on the evidence he had a sufficient justification in doing, and calling upon others of the crew to assist them in resisting the captain’s authority, then I think that it was an attempt to excite a revolt.’ (t)

On an indictment upon the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 9, it appeared that the prisoners were two of the mates and the others mariners of a merchant ship, and the captain seeing something in the manner of a sailor which displeased him spoke sharply to him and ordered him to leave the helm, and called to some one else to take his place, and he ordered the sailor to go and grease the masts, which the captain thought necessary to be done. The sailor peremptorily refused, and the captain on that ordered all hands up: he desired the mates to have the masts greased, which the men refused to do, and said that it was the duty of the boys, and that whilst there were boys on board they would not. The captain positively insisted, and the men as positively refused. He then said, ‘If that’s the case, I’ll put you on short commons; that beef which is lying there you shan’t have,’ and ordered it to be taken below, on which there was a peremptory refusal to let him have it. The captain, who saw that this did not meet with the slightest opposition from the mates, perceived the disposition to mutiny, and that he must act at once or there would be no

What is an endeavour to make a revolt.

A revolt and imprisonment of a captain can only be justified by a reasonable belief that otherwise the captain will kill or inflict grievous bodily harm on some of the crew.

authority, went down and armed himself with a cutlass, came again on deck and said, 'Give me that beef!' and speaking to the steward said, 'Take it below, and the first man who interferes, I will exercise my authority, and cut him down with the instrument with which I am armed.' The steward, seeing the captain was not to be trifled with, obeyed; the beef was taken down and the captain put away his cutlass, and, after staying on deck some time, went down, and had his dinner, and then believing he had done sufficient to assert his authority, he sent the beef back, and allowed the crew to have their dinners. After the beef was taken away, the men all refused to do anything, and went below; however the captain thought that all this had passed away. After this the steward requested the captain to come on deck, as the men wanted to speak to him. He went on deck, was made prisoner, and confined in his cabin, the vessel put about, and brought to Plymouth by the mate and crew, and there the crew made a complaint against the captain. Williams, J., told the jury that in considering the meaning of the terms used in the statute he must tell them that confederating together and making a revolt constituted the offence charged, unless they were satisfied that there was some justifiable cause. The great question for their consideration was, whether or not there was any justification for this unquestionable confinement of the captain. Did, therefore, his conduct afford any justification for that step? He was bound to tell them that, according to the authorities, a seaman was not justified in making a revolt in a ship, or in imprisoning his captain, by reason of that captain having been unjust or unreasonable; it was not to be allowed that seamen should take the law into their own hands, because the captain had issued an unjust order, or had conducted himself in a harassing or embarrassing manner. If the rule of law was that whenever the seamen considered the captain's conduct unreasonable and rash, they could take charge of the ship, there would be an end to all maritime discipline. It was necessary, for the due maintenance of discipline that mutiny and revolt, if not justifiable, should be punished as a crime in the merchant service as well as in the royal navy. In his opinion, in point of law, it was justifiable in one view only, namely, if the conduct of the captain had been such as to afford reasonable ground for concluding that, unless the men had imprisoned him, the crew, or some one or more of them, would have been in danger of their lives, or of suffering some grievous bodily harm from his conduct. If they thought that was made out, and that the conduct of the captain was such that the lives of the crew were in danger unless he were imprisoned, then there was a justification. But if they should not come to the conclusion that there was reasonable ground for this belief, then, in point of law, they ought to find the prisoners guilty. (u)

On an indictment on the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 9, for making a revolt in a merchant ship, it appeared that the prisoners formed

(u) Reg. v. Rose, 2 Cox C.C. 329. As reported, this direction is open to the objection that it did not inform the jury that the captain might lawfully use any force that was reasonably necessary to retain the command of the vessel and part of a crew of a steam vessel trading between London and Holland; their register tickets were deposited with the captain, but no agreement in writing had been entered into with them previously to their sailing on the voyage during which the revolt was made, and the Recorder held that the prisoners were not mariners, or seamen; the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 2, (v) made any contract other than the agreement thereby required illegal, and therefore the relation of commander and mariner did not exist. (w)

Upon an indictment on the 18 Geo. 2, c. 30, a question was made whether adhering to the King's enemies in hostilely cruising in their ships could be tried as piracy under the usual commission granted by virtue of the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15. The 18 Geo. 2, recites that doubts had arisen whether subjects entering into the service of the King's enemies on board privateers and other ships, having commissions from France and Spain, and having by such adherence been guilty of high treason, could be deemed guilty of felony within the intent of the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, and be triable by the Court of Admiralty appointed by virtue of the said Act; and then enacts that persons who shall commit hostilities upon the sea, &c., against his Majesty's subjects by virtue or under colour of any commission from any of his Majesty's enemies, or shall be any otherwise adherent to his Majesty's enemies upon the sea, &c., may be tried as pirates, felons, or robbers, in the said Court of Admiralty in the same manner as persons guilty of piracy, felony, and robbery, are by the said Act directed to be tried; but it does not say that they shall be deemed pirates, &c., as in the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7. The prisoner having been convicted, the question was reserved for consideration of the judges; and it was agreed by eight who were present, (x) that the prisoner had been well tried under the commission. For that taking the 11 & 12 Will. 3, and 18 Geo. 2 together, and the doubt raised in the latter, and also its enactment that in the instances therein mentioned, and also in case of any other adhering to the King's enemies, the parties might be tried as pirates by the Court of Admiralty according to that statute, it was substantially declaring that they should be deemed pirates; and that it was a just construction in their favour to allow them to be tried as such by a jury. (y)

Accessories to piracy were triable only by the civil law if their offence was committed on the sea, and were not triable at all if their offence was committed on land, until the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 10, which enacts, 'that every person and persons whatsoever, who shall either on the land, or upon the seas, knowingly or wittingly set forth any pirate; or aid and assist, or maintain, procure, command, counsel, or advise, any person or persons whatsoever, to do or commit any piracies or robberies upon the seas; and such person and persons shall thereupon do or commit any such piracy or robbery, then all and every such person or persons what-

And then the statute directs, 'that all such accessories to such piracies and robberies shall be inquired of, tried, heard, determined, and adjudged, after the common course of the laws of this land, according to the 28 Hen. 8, as the principals of such piracies and robberies may and ought to be, and no otherwise: and being thereupon attainted, shall suffer such pains of death, (z) losses of lands, goods, and chattels, and in like manner, as such principals ought to suffer, according to the 28 Hen. 8, which is thereby declared to continue in full force.

But accessories are declared to be principals, and are to be tried accordingly by 8 Geo. 1, c. 24.

The 8 Geo. 1, c. 24, however, makes an alteration with respect to the accessories described in 11 & 12 Will. 3, and declares them to be principals, and that they shall be tried accordingly. Sec. 3, reciting that 'whereas there are some defects in the laws for bringing persons who are accessories to piracy and robbery upon the seas to condign punishment, if the principal who committed such piracy or robbery is not or cannot be apprehended and brought to justice,' enacts, 'that all persons whatsoever, who by the 11 & 12 Will. 3, are declared to be accessory or accessories to any piracy or robbery therein mentioned, are hereby declared to be principal pirates, felons, and robbers, and shall and may be inquired of, heard, determined, and adjudged, in the same manner as persons guilty of piracy and robbery may, according to that statute; and being thereupon attainted and convicted, shall suffer death (z) and loss of lands, &c., in like manner as pirates and robbers ought by the said act to suffer.'

One who knowingly received and abetted a pirate within the body of a county was not triable by the common law, the original offence being cognizable alone by another jurisdiction. (b) But see now the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 9. (c)

The Court of King's Bench holding, that because Scadding's offence depended on the piracy committed by the principal, of which the temporal judges had no cognizance, and was, as it were, an accessorial offence to the first piracy which was determinable by the admiral, it was sufficient ground for remanding him. Yelv. 134. 2 East, P. SEC. II.

Of the Place in which the Offence may be committed.

THE 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, s. 1, enacts, that all treasons, felonies, robberies, murders, and confederacies, committed in or upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral has, or pretends to have, power, authority, or jurisdiction, shall be inquired, tried, &c., in such shires and places as shall be limited by the King's commission, as if any such offences had been committed upon the land.

28 Hen. 8, c. 15.
Offences to be tried in the places limited by commission.

In a case at the Admiralty session of a murder committed in a part of Milford Haven, where it was about three miles over, about seven or eight miles from the mouth of the river, or open sea, and about sixteen miles below any bridges over the river, a question was made whether the place where the murder was committed was to be considered as within the limits to which commissions granted under the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, do by law extend. Upon reference to the judges, they were unanimously of opinion that the trial was properly had. And it is said that during the discussion of the point the construction of this statute by Lord Hale (d) was much preferred to the doctrine of Lord Coke; (e) and that most, if not all, of the judges, seemed to think that the common law has a concurrent jurisdiction with the Admiralty in this haven, and in all other havens, creeks, and rivers in this realm. (f) It appeared to them that the 28 Hen. 8 applied to all great waters frequented by ships; that in such waters the admiral, in the time of Hen. 8, pretended jurisdiction; that by havens, &c., havens in England were meant to be included, though they are all within the body of some county; and that the mischief from the witnesses being seafaring men was likely to apply to all places frequented by ships. (g)

Concurrent jurisdiction of the common law and Admiralty in Milford Haven, &c.

If a robbery be committed in creeks, harbours, ports, &c., in foreign countries, the Court of Admiralty indisputably has jurisdiction of it, and such offence is, consequently, piracy. (h)

It is clear that upon the open sea-shore the common law and the Admiralty have alternate jurisdiction between high and low water-

(f) Bruce's case, 2 Leach, 1093. Russ. & Ry. 243. This was a case of murder. The stat. 15 Rich. 2, c. 3, gives the admiral jurisdiction to inquire of the death of a man, and of a mayhem done in great ships, hovering in the main stream of great rivers, beneath the bridges of the same rivers nigh to the sea, and in none other places of the same rivers; which jurisdiction is only concurrent with, and not in exclusion of, the common law. 1 East, P. C. 368. It is most probable that pountz in the 15 Rich. 2, c. 3, means points and not bridges. In 'A description of the River Thames' (Longman, 1752), it is said that the Lord Mayor of London used to summon a jury four times a year 'to make inquisition after all offences committed on the Thames and Medway up the river as far as Staines Bridge, and down the river as far as the points of it next the sea,' and that 'the jurisdiction of the City of London in the river of Thames from Staines Bridge westward unto the points of the river next to the sea eastward, appeareth to belong to the City.' All this appears to be taken from old charters. In 1347, it appears that persons setting kiddels ultra Genland (Yantlett) versus mare were fined. P. 94, 95, 96. In later times Yendall or Yenlet seems from old charters to be the limit, P. 139. All this seems to show that pountz means points, not bridges.

mark; (i) but it is sometimes a matter of difficulty to fix the line of demarcation between the county and the high sea in harbours, or below the bridges in great rivers. The question is often more a matter of fact than of law, and determinable by local evidence; but some general rules upon the point are collected by Mr. East. He says, that 'in general it is said that such parts of the rivers, arms, or creeks, are deemed to be within the bodies of counties where persons can see from one side to the other. Lord Hale, in his treatise De jure maris, says that the arm or branch of the sea which lies within the fauces terræ, where a man may reasonably discern between shore and shore, is, or at least may be, within the body of a county. Hawkins, however, considers the line more accurately confined, by other authorities, to such parts of the sea where a man, standing on the one side of the land, may see what is done on the other; and the reason assigned by Lord Coke in the Admiralty case (k) in support of the county coroner's jurisdiction, where a man is killed in such places, because that the county may well know it, seems rather to support the more limited construction. But at least, where there is any doubt, the jurisdiction of the common law ought to be preferred.' (l)

A bay within headlands may be within the Admiralty jurisdiction.

Where a murder was committed in Roundstone Bay, and it appeared that the place in question was within the county of Galway, and that the headlands bounding the bay were so situated that a man could see from the one to the other, and that the place in question would fall within a straight line drawn from the one headland to the other, and that in that part of the bay there were fifteen fathoms water, and that a ship of 120 tons could sail there; but there was no evidence of its having been frequented by shipping, or of any Admiralty process having ever been executed within it; it was held by the judges in Ireland, that the murderer was rightly tried under an Admiralty commission. (m) Penarth Roads case. The whole of the inland sea between the counties of Somerset and Glamorgan is within those counties.

But where, upon an indictment for maliciously wounding in the county of Glamorgan, it appeared that the prisoners were Americans, and they and the person wounded were part of the crew of the American ship Gleaner, which sailed from the docks of Cardiff to an anchorage in Penarth Roads, and the offence was committed shortly before she arrived at that anchorage, when the ship was three quarters of a mile from land, in a place never left dry by the tide; but she was within a quarter of a mile of the land which is left dry by the tide. The shore of the county of Glamorgan extends many miles up and down the Bristol Channel from the place where the offence was committed. The spot in question was in the Bristol Channel, between the Glamorganshire and Somersetshire coasts, and was about ten miles from the opposite coast of Somersetshire. Two islands, called the Flat and Steep Holmes, are outside the anchorage-ground, and farther from the shore than it is, but not lower down the Channel, being abreast of the anchorage-ground. When the offence was committed the ship was inside, and about two miles from, the Flat Holmes, and four or five miles from the Steep Holmes, and was within the Lavernock

Point in Penarth Roads, but outside Penarth Head. Penarth Head and Lavernock Point form a bay. It is three miles from Lavernock Point. At Penarth Head persons can see from one to the other, and could see what a vessel was doing from one to the other, but could not see the people from one to the other. From where the ship was persons could see people at Lavernock, and see what they were doing if they took particular notice of them, and they could see the coast of Somersetshire in a clear day. The mouth of the Severn is at King's Road, higher up the Channel. The Holmes are part of the parish of St. Mary's, Cardiff, and taxes had been collected from the occupiers of Flat Holmes for St. Mary's parish. By an order of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, the port of Cardiff had been fixed so as to include the spot in question. It was objected that the prisoners could not be tried in the county of Glamorgan, as there was no proof that the offence was committed in that county; but it was held that the offence was committed in that county. Cockburn, C. J.: 'The question is, whether the part of the sea on which the vessel was at the time when the offence was committed forms part of the body of the county of Glamorgan; and we are of opinion that it does. The sea in question is part of the Bristol Channel, both shores of which form part of England and Wales, of the county of Somerset on one side, and the county of Glamorgan on the other. We are of opinion that, looking at the local situation of this sea, it must be taken to belong to the counties respectively by the shores of which it is bounded; and the fact of the Holmes, between which and the shore of the county of Glamorgan the place in question is situated, having always been treated as part of the parish of Cardiff and as part of the county of Glamorgan, is a strong illustration of the principle on which we proceed, namely, that the whole of this inland sea between the counties of Somerset and Glamorgan is to be considered as within the counties, by the shores of which its several parts are respectively bounded. We are, therefore, of opinion that the place in question is within the body of the county of Glamorgan.'⁽ⁿ⁾

The question, whether the fact were committed on the sea or within the body of a county, is of main importance; for if it turn out that the goods were taken any where within the body of a county, the commissioners under the statute of Hen. 8 can have no jurisdiction to inquire of it; and if it should appear that the goods were taken at sea, and afterwards brought on shore, the offender cannot be indicted as for a larceny in that county into which they were carried, because the original felony was not a taking of which the common law takes cognizance.^(o) And the 39 Geo. 3, c. 37, ^(p) relates only to offences committed on the high seas, and out of the body of any county.^(q)

⁽ⁿ⁾ Reg. v. Cunningham, Bell C. C. 72. As the offence in this case was committed on a foreign vessel, it could not have been tried as an Admiralty offence. Where a prisoner was indicted for stealing three chests of tea out of the Aurora, of London, on the high seas, and it was proved that the larceny was committed while the vessel lay off Wampa, in the river, twenty or thirty miles from the sea, but there was no evidence as to the tide flowing, or otherwise, at the place where the vessel lay, it was held, from the circumstance that the tea was stolen on board the vessel, which had crossed the ocean, that there was sufficient evidence that the larceny was committed on the high seas. (r)

It was decided that where A., standing on the shore of a harbour, fired a loaded musket at a revenue cutter, which had struck upon a sandbank in the sea, about one hundred yards from the shore, by which firing a person was maliciously killed on board the vessel, it was piracy; for the offence was committed where the death happened, and not at the place from whence the cause of death proceeded. (s) And if a man be struck upon the high sea, and die upon the shore after the reflux of the water, the admiral, by virtue of his commission, has no cognizance of the offence. (t) And as it was doubtful whether it could be tried at common law, it is provided by statute that the offender may be tried in the county where the death, stroke, poisoning, or hurt happened. (u)

The 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, s. 2, introduces 'manslaughters,' and uses the words 'havens,' &c., without the qualification in the first section, where the admiral has a jurisdiction. One of the mischiefs recited in the first section is, that the witnesses being commonly mariners and shipmen, depart without long tarrying or protraction of time. The statute is almost in terms with 27 Hen. 8, c. 4, except that it adds 'treasons' to the offences.

It seems that the 27 Hen. 8 does not authorise the trial of felonies created by subsequent statutes, for which provision was therefore made by the 39 Geo. 3, c. 37. (v) The prisoner was indicted for maliciously shooting, and the offence was within a few weeks after the passing of the 39 Geo. 3, and before notice of it could have reached the place where the offence was committed; and, upon a case reserved, none of the judges supposed that the party could have been tried if the 39 Geo. 3 had not passed; and as he could not have known of that Act, they thought it right that he should have a pardon. (w) And it was decided that a party was not triable under both or either of these statutes for maliciously shooting, within 43 Geo. 3, c. 58 (now repealed); but this decision proceeded upon the terms of the 43 Geo. 3, which confined its operation to England and Ireland. SEC. III.

Of the Court by which the Offence of Piracy may be tried.

THE offence of piracy was formerly cognizable only by the Admiralty Courts, which proceeded without a jury, in a method much conformed to the civil law. But it being inconsistent with the liberties of the nation that any man's life should be taken away, unless by the judgment of his peers, or the common law of the land, the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, established a new jurisdiction. That statute enacted, that this offence should be tried by commissioners nominated by the Lord Chancellor, the indictment being first found by a grand jury of twelve men, and afterwards tried by another jury as at common law, and that the course of proceeding should be according to the law of the land. Amongst the commissioners there were always some of the common law judges; (y) and by the Admiralty Court, thus constituted, the offence of piracy, and other marine offences, may now be tried. But the 28 Hen. 8 merely altered the mode of trial in the Admiralty Court; and its jurisdiction still continues to rest on the same foundations as it did before that Act. It is regulated by the civil law, et per consuetudines marinas grounded on the law of nations, which may possibly give to that Court a jurisdiction that our common law has not. (z)

The 32 Geo. 2, c. 25, s. 20, for the more speedy bringing of offenders to justice, &c., enacts, that a session of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery for the trial of offences committed upon the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, shall be holden twice at least in every year; viz., in March and October, at the Old Bailey (except when the sessions of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery for London and Middlesex shall be there holden), or in such other places in England as the Lord High Admiral, &c., shall, in writing under his hand, directed to the judge of the Court of Admiralty, appoint. And the 7 Geo. 4, c. 38, was passed, to enable the commissioners for trying offences committed upon the sea, and justices of the peace to take examination touching such offences, and to commit to safe custody persons charged therewith. Punishments,

c. 28, s. 12.

By 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, s. 12, 'All offences prosecuted in the High Court of Admiralty of England shall upon every first and subsequent conviction be subject to the same punishments, whether of death or otherwise, as if such offences had been committed upon the land.'

Offences
against the Consolidation
Acts committed at sea.

Each of the Consolidation Acts of 1861 makes the offences committed on the sea against it of the same nature as if they had been committed on land in England or Ireland, and triable where the offender is apprehended or in custody. (a)

Offences com-

minal Court.

The Central Criminal Court Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 36, s. 22, enacts, that 'it shall and may be lawful for the justices and judges of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery to be named in, and appointed by the commissions to be issued under the authority of this Act, or any two or more of them, to inquire of, hear, and determine any offence or offences committed, or alleged to have been committed on the high seas, and other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, and to deliver the gaol of Newgate of any person or persons committed to, or detained therein for any offence or offences alleged to have been done and committed upon the high seas aforesaid, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England; and all indictments found, and trials, and other proceedings had or taken by and before the said justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery shall be valid and effectual to all intents and purposes whatsoever.'

An accessory before the fact to a felony committed on the high seas within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, might be indicted and tried at the Central Criminal Court by virtue of the preceding section and the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 9 (now repealed), although the principal had not been 'committed to, or detained in,' the gaol of Newgate for his offence. Offences committed by British seamen at foreign ports to be within Admiralty jurisdiction.

(d) Sec. 3 provided for the commitment of persons charged with offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty under the 7 Geo. 4, c. 38, but so much of that Act as related to the examination and commitment of such persons was repealed by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 34, and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 69, s. 31, which was repealed by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93, s. 43, and the examination and commitment of such persons are now regulated by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93. It seems, therefore, that sec. 3 of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2, is virtually repealed. Sec. 4 of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2, provides that the Act shall not affect the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, or commissions under the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15.

board a British ship, or that they were British subjects; and to counts alleging that the prisoner was master of a British ship afloat in the river Elbe, and that he there committed the murder, it was objected that these counts did not allege the murder to have been committed 'on the high seas.' But Wightman, J., thought the provision in the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2, as to the high seas, only directory, and overruled the objections, and, as they were on the record, refused to reserve them. (g)

Jurisdiction in case of offences on board ship.

By the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 21, 'if any person, being a British subject, charged with having committed any crime or offence on board any British ship on the high seas or in any foreign port or harbour, or if any person, not being a British subject, charged with having committed any crime or offence on board any British ship on the high seas, is found within the jurisdiction of any court of justice in Her Majesty's dominions which would have had cognizance of such crime or offence if committed within the limits of its ordinary jurisdiction, such court shall have jurisdiction to hear and try the case as if such crime or offence had been committed within such limits.'

Offences by foreigners in British ships are punishable by the law of England, and triable at the assizes.

A ship, public or private, on the high seas, is considered a part of the territory to which the ship belongs, and a foreigner committing an offence in it is amenable to the laws of such territory. Upon an indictment for wounding G. Smith, with intent to do him some grievous bodily harm, it was proved that the prisoner, a foreigner, being a sailor and one of the crew of the British ship Ontario, maliciously and unlawfully wounded the prosecutor, also a foreigner and a sailor, and one of the crew of the same ship, whilst on the high seas and in the said ship, on a voyage from London to the coast of East Africa. The prisoner was tried and convicted at the Assizes at Exeter; and a case was reserved upon the question whether the prisoner, a foreigner, was properly convicted of the offence committed on the high seas. (h) In another case, (i) upon an indictment for murder, tried at the Central Criminal Court, it appeared that the prisoner was a foreigner, and had committed a larceny in England, and then went with part of the stolen property to Hamburg. The owner of the property gave information to the London police, and the deceased, who was a detective officer of that force, and an English subject, went, and, with the assistance of the police of Hamburg, arrested the prisoner there, and brought him against his will on board an English steamer trading between Hamburg and London, in order that he might be tried for the larceny. Hamburg is on the river Elbe, sixty miles from the sea; but the tide flows higher up than the place where the steamer was when the prisoner was taken on board. The steamer left Hamburg on the 21st of November, the prisoner being in irons, and on the 22nd, whilst on the high seas, he shot the officer, who died of the wound. If the killing had been by an Englishman, in an English county, it would have been murder. The deceased had no warrant; and a case was reserved upon the question whether there was any jurisdiction to try the prisoner at the Central Criminal Court? It was contended in both cases that there was no jurisdiction to try the prisoner under sec. 21 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91. Lopez was not 'found' within the jurisdiction of the Court at Exeter, but was brought into the jurisdiction in custody and against his will, having been 'found' in the ship. (k) The clause was intended to apply to cases where an offender, having escaped, was discovered afterwards within another jurisdiction. In Sattler's case, the original caption at Hamburg was unlawful, and he was illegally taken on board the steamer. There is no extradition treaty between Hamburg and this country, and the arrest at Hamburg was without any warrant or authority; and therefore it cannot be said that he was 'found' within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court. Secondly, in neither case had the prisoner committed any offence for which he was amenable to the English law. In none of the statutes, except the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 21, are foreigners mentioned, and they are not to be included in them by implication. It must be admitted that Lopez went on board the vessel voluntarily; but Sattler, as a foreigner, owed no allegiance to our laws; and as he did not enter into our jurisdiction voluntarily, no allegiance was created thereby. No allegiance can be created by bringing a foreigner forcibly and illegally from his own land. For the Crown it was contended:—First, that the word 'found' meant that a man might be tried at any place where he is at the time of the trial. Secondly, that it is a general principle that a ship, public or private, on the high seas is, for the purpose of jurisdiction over crimes therein committed, a part of the territory of the country to which the ship belongs, and a person coming voluntarily or involuntarily on board an English ship is as much amenable to the criminal law of England as if he came voluntarily or involuntarily into an English county. Lord Campbell, C. J.: 'We are all of opinion that in both these cases the conviction must be sustained. In the case of Lopez, we have no doubt that the offence committed by the prisoner was, under the circumstances, an offence against the laws of England. The prisoner, a foreigner, was in an English ship; he was under the protection of English laws, and he therefore owed obedience to the English laws, and was guilty of an offence against those laws when he maliciously wounded another foreigner, one of the crew of the same ship, on the high seas. It is unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the authorities cited to prove that proposition—they are quite overwhelming; and I am glad to find that in this respect the law of America and France is the same as our own. Then the only other question is, whether there was jurisdiction under the commission of oyer and terminer to try the prisoner at Exeter for that offence; and upon that point we entertain as little doubt. The Court at Exeter would not have had jurisdiction before the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 21; but that statute is quite conclusive on the subject, and seems to have been passed for the purpose of removing any doubt that might arise. It provides that offences committed by foreigners in British vessels on the high seas may be tried by any Court within the jurisdiction of which the offender is found, if the offence is one which would have been cognizable by such Court, supposing it to have been committed within the limits of its ordinary jurisdiction. Here the offence, if committed within the county of Devon, would certainly have been triable at Exeter; and as the prisoner was found within that jurisdiction, it is the same as if the offence had been committed within the limits of that jurisdiction, and we therefore think there was clearly jurisdiction in the Court at Exeter to try him there, and that he was legally convicted. With regard to the case of Sattler, we think it equally clear that, although the prisoner was a foreigner, the offence of which he was convicted was an offence against the laws of England. [Lord Campbell here stated the facts.] Then, here a crime is committed by the prisoner on board an English ship on the high seas, which would have been murder if the killing had been by an Englishman in an English county; and we are of opinion that, under these circumstances, whether the capture at Hamburgh and the subsequent detention were lawful or unlawful, the prisoner was guilty of murder and an offence against the laws of England; for he was in an English ship—part of the territory of England—entitled to the protection of the English law, and he owed obedience to that law; and he committed the crime of murder—that is to say, he shot the detective officer, not for the purpose of obtaining his liberation, but for revenge, and of malice prepense. Then comes the question, whether the Central Criminal Court had jurisdiction to try the prisoner for this offence; and it appears to us that the late Act was framed for the purpose of obviating, and does obviate, all doubt upon such a subject. A man is “found” wherever he is actually present, and the prisoner was “found” within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, and we are all of opinion that the Court had jurisdiction to try him. It was contended that the prisoner was not “found” within the jurisdiction, because he was brought within it against his will; but, upon the construction of the statute, we are all of a different opinion.’ (l)

(g) Reg. v. Menham, 1 F. & F. 369.

(h) Reg. v. Lopez, D. & B., 525.

(l) Reg. v. Lopez and Reg. v. Sattler, supra. These cases were argued separately, but only one judgment delivered. All that these cases really decide is that the prisoners were properly tried under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 21, and it was quite unnecessary to decide whether they could have been tried under any other Act, and it is to be regretted that Lord Campbell should have said that they could not, as that dictum is clearly erroneous; and as the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, apply only to merchant vessels, it is right to correct that error. In the argument in Reg. v. Lopez, C. J. Cockburn said, ‘There is a strong opinion that but for the difficulty as to laying the venue, a person committing an offence on the high seas in an English ship would have been amenable to punishment at the common law.’ And that opinion is clearly right. The distinction is this—wherever a murder or other felony against the law of nature or nations was committed in England or on the narrow seas, it was triable by jury in the Court of King’s Bench and courts of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery. But wherever a murder or such other felony was committed on the high seas it could not be tried by a jury (because a jury by the common law could only take cognizance of felonies committed within the local jurisdiction from which they were summoned), but such murders and other felonies were always triable by the court of admiralty, which proceeded according to the course of the civil law. To this proceeding, there was the vital objection that it did not try by a jury, and either the accused must plainly confess his offence, or there must be two witnesses who saw the offence committed; and this led to the passing of the 28 Hen. 8. c. 15, as is plain from the preamble and 3 Inst. 112. Now, that Act in terms makes ‘all treasons, felonies, robberies, murders, and confederacies’ committed upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek or place where the admiral has jurisdiction, triable by commissions issued under that Act, and as that Act did not create or alter any offence, but left the offences as they were before it passed, 3 Inst. 112, it is clear that all the offences mentioned in it were offences triable by the court of admiralty, and were by that

The prisoner, the master of an English ship, entered into a contract with the Chilian Government, whereby he agreed to convey to the port of Liverpool five persons who had been ordered by that Government to be transported. These persons were brought by force on board the ship, guarded by soldiers of that State, and conveyed by the prisoner, under the contract, and against their will, to Liverpool. At the time the prisoner received these persons on board, the ship was lying in the territorial waters of Chili. The prisoner having been convicted on these facts upon an indictment for false imprisonment and assault tried at Liverpool, it was held that the conviction could not be sustained for what was done within the Chilian waters. It must be assumed that in Chili the act of the Government towards its subjects was lawful; and, although an English ship, in some respects, carries with her the laws of her country in the territorial waters of a foreign State, yet, in other respects, she is subject to the laws of that State, as to acts done to the subjects thereof. The Government could justify all that it did within its own territory, and it followed that the prisoner could justify all that he did there as agent for the Government, and under its authority. (m) But the conviction was sustained for that which was done out of the Chilian territory. It is clear that an English ship on the high sea, out of any foreign territory, is subject to the laws of England; and persons, whether foreign or English, on board such ship, are as much amenable to English law as they would be on English soil. Such being the law, if the act of the prisoner amounted to a false imprisonment he was liable to be convicted. Now, as the contract of the prisoner was to receive the five persons on board the ship and to take them, without their consent, over the sea to England, although he was justified in first receiving them in Chili, yet that justification ceased when he passed the line of Chilian jurisdiction, and after that it was a wrong which was intentionally planned and executed in pursuance of the contract, amounting in law to false imprisonment. It may be that transportation to England is lawful by the law of Chili, and that a Chilian ship might so lawfully transport Chilian subjects; but for an English ship the laws of Chili, out of that State, are powerless, and the lawfulness of the acts must be tried by English law. (n)

By the last clause of sec. 1 of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2, the Court may 'order the payment of the costs and expenses of the prosecution of Admiralty offences in the manner prescribed by the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, in the case of felonies tried in the Court of Admiralty;' and by the last clause in the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 267, the costs of the prosecution of any such offence as is therein mentioned may

Act made triable by a jury under the commissions issued under it. Then the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2, s. 1, gave courts of oyer and terminer or general gaol delivery all the powers which were given by any Act to commissioners in any commission of oyer and terminer for trying offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty. So that it is clear that the courts of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery have now the same jurisdiction as commissioners under the 28 Hen. 8, c. 15, or as the Court of Admiralty before that Act passed. In other words, such murders and other felonies are now triable by the courts of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery.

CHAPTER THE NINTH.

OF NEGLECTING QUARANTINE, OF SPREADING CONTAGIOUS DISORDERS, AND OF INJURY TO THE PUBLIC HEALTH.

SEC. I.

Of neglecting Quarantine.

THE performance of quarantine, or forty days' probation, when ships arrive from countries infected with contagious disorders, having been considered as of the highest importance, with reference to the public health of the nation, has been enforced from time to time by various legislative enactments. These were formerly of considerable severity: but the 6 Geo. 4, c. 78, repeals all former Acts upon this subject, and enforces the performance of quarantine principally by pecuniary penalties. Some offences, however, subject the offender to imprisonment, and some are of the degree of felony. It may be here observed, that in a case which arose upon 26 Geo. 2, c. 6, which enacted, that all persons going on board ships coming from infected places should obey such orders as the King in Council should make, but did not award any particular punishment, nor contain a clause as to the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace, it was holden that disobedience of such an order of council was an indictable offence, and punishable as a misdemeanor at common law. (a)

By the 6 Geo. 4, c. 78, s. 17, 'if any commander, master, or other person, having charge of any vessel liable to perform quarantine, and on board of which the plague, or other infectious disease or distemper, shall not then have appeared, shall himself quit, or shall knowingly permit or suffer any seaman or passenger coming in such vessel to quit such vessel, by going on shore, or by going on board any other vessel or boat, before such quarantine shall be fully performed, unless by such license as shall be granted by virtue of any order in council, to be made concerning quarantine as aforesaid, or in case any commander or other person having charge of such vessel shall not, within a convenient time after due notice given for that purpose, cause such vessel, and the lading thereof, to be conveyed into the place or places appointed for such vessel and lading to perform quarantine; then, and in every such case every such commander, master, or other person as aforesaid, for every such offence shall forfeit and pay the sum of four hundred pounds; and if any such person coming in any such vessel liable to quarantine (or any pilot or other person going on board the same, either before or after the arrival of such vessel at any port or place in the United Kingdom, or the islands aforesaid), shall, either before

Sec. 21. 'If any officer of his Majesty's customs, or any other officer or person whatsoever, to whom it doth or shall appertain to execute any order or orders made or to be made concerning quarantine, or the prevention of infection, as notified as aforesaid, or to see the same put in execution, shall knowingly and wilfully embezzle any goods or articles performing quarantine, or be guilty of any other breach or neglect of his duty in respect of the vessels, persons, goods, or articles, performing quarantine, every such officer or person so offending shall forfeit such office or employment as he may be possessed of, and shall become from thence incapable to hold or enjoy the same, or to take a new grant thereof; and every such officer and person shall forfeit and pay the sum of two hundred pounds; and if any such officer or person shall desert from his duty when employed as aforesaid, or shall knowingly and willingly permit any person, vessel, goods, or merchandize, to depart or to be conveyed out of the said lazaret vessel or other place as aforesaid, unless by permission under an order of his Majesty, by and with the advice of his council, or under an order of two or more of the lords or others of his privy council; or if any person hereby authorised and directed to give a certificate of a vessel having duly performed quarantine or airing, shall knowingly give a false certificate thereof, every such person so offending shall be guilty of felony; (b) and if any such officer or person shall knowingly or wilfully damage any goods performing quarantine under his direction, he shall be liable to pay one hundred pounds damages, and full costs of suit, to the owner of the same.'

The publication in the London Gazette of any order in council, or of any order by two or more of the lords or others of the privy council, made in pursuance of the Act, or his Majesty's royal proclamation made in pursuance of the same, is to be deemed and taken to be sufficient notice to all persons concerned, of all matters therein respectively contained.

The statute also enacts, that in any prosecution, suit, or other proceedings against any person, for any offence against this Act, or any which may hereafter be passed concerning quarantine, or for any breach or disobedience of any order made by his Majesty by the advice of his privy council, concerning quarantine, and the prevention of infection, notified or published as aforesaid, or of any order or orders made by two or more of the privy council, the answers of the commander, master, or other person, having charge of any vessel, to any question or interrogatories put to him by virtue and in pursuance of the Act, or of any Act which may hereafter be passed concerning quarantine, or of any such order or orders as aforesaid, shall be received as evidence so far as the same relate to the place from which such vessel came, or to the place or places at which she touched in the course of her voyage: and also that where any vessel shall have been directed to perform quarantine by the superintendent of quarantine, or his assistant, or, where there is no superintendent or assistant, by the principal officer of the customs at any port or place, or other officer of the customs authorized to act in that behalf; the having been so directed to perform quarantine shall be given and received as evidence that such vessel was liable to quarantine, unless satisfactory proof be produced by the defendant to show that the vessel did not come from, or touch at, any such place or places as is or are stated in the said answers, or that such vessel, although directed to perform quarantine, was not liable to the performance thereof. And it further enacts, that where any vessel shall in fact have been put under quarantine by the superintendent, &c., and shall actually be performing the same, such vessel shall, in any prosecution, &c. for any offence against this act, or any other act hereafter passed concerning quarantine, or against any orders of council as aforesaid, be deemed liable to quarantine, without proving in what manner or from what circumstances such vessel became liable to the performance thereof.

and the having been directed to perform quarantine is to be received as prima facie evidence that the vessels were liable thereto; and the being in performance of quarantine to be proof of liability to quarantine.

SEC. II.

Of Spreading Contagious Disorders, and of Injury to the Public Health.

WITH the same regard to the public health, upon which the statutes relating to quarantine have proceeded, the Legislature appears to have acted in former times, in making persons guilty of felony who, being infected with the plague, went abroad and into company, with infectious sores upon them, after being commanded by the magistrates to stay at home. (c) The statute which contained this enactment, after being continued for some time, is now expired: but Lord Hale puts the question, whether if a person infected with the plague should go abroad with intent to infect another, and another be thereby infected and die, it would not be murder by the common law. (d) And he seems to consider it as clear, that though where no such intent appears it cannot be murder, yet, if by the conversation of such a person another should be infected, it would be a great misdemeanor. (d)

In a case relating to the small-pox, it was held that the exposing in the public highway, with a full knowledge of the fact, a person infected with a contagious disorder is a common nuisance, Persons infected with the plague going abroad and infecting others.

It is an indictable offence unlawfully and injuriously to carry a child infected with the small-pox along a public highway, in which persons are passing, and near to the habitations of the King's subjects.

Unlawfully to expose a person infected with a contagious disorder in a public highway is indictable.

And it is also an indictable offence in an apothecary, after having inoculated children, unlawfully and injuriously to cause them to be exposed in the public street to the danger of the public health.

and as such the subject of an indictment. The defendant was indicted for carrying her child, while infected with the small-pox, along a public highway, in which persons were passing, and near to the habitations of the King's subjects; and having suffered judgment to go by default, it was moved, in arrest of judgment, that it was consistent with the indictment that the child might have caught the disease, and that it was not shown that the act was unlawful, as the mother might have carried it through the street, in order to procure medical advice; and that the indictment ought to have alleged, that there was some sore upon the child at the time when it was so carried. It was also urged, that the only offences against the public health of which Hawkins speaks are spreading the plague and neglecting quarantine; (e) and that it appeared that Lord Hardwicke thought the building of a house for the reception of patients inoculated with the small-pox was not a public nuisance, and mentioned that upon an indictment of that kind there had been an acquittal. (f) But Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, that if there had been any such necessity as supposed for the conduct of the defendant, it might have been given in evidence as matter of defence: but there was no such evidence; and as the indictment alleged that the act was done unlawfully and injuriously, it precluded the presumption that there was any such necessity. Le Blanc, J., in passing sentence observed, that although the Court had not found upon its records any prosecution for this specific offence, yet there could be no doubt in point of law, that if any one unlawfully, injuriously, and with full knowledge of the fact, exposes in a public highway a person infected with a contagious disorder, it is a common nuisance to all the subjects, and indictable as such. That the Court did not pronounce that every person who inoculated for this disease was guilty of an offence, provided it was done in a proper manner, and the patient was kept from the society of others, so as not to endanger a communication of the disease. But no person, having a disorder of this description upon him, ought to be publicly exposed, to the endangering the health and lives of the rest of the subjects. (g)

In a subsequent case, where the indictment was against an apothecary for unlawfully and injuriously inoculating children with the small-pox, and while they were sick of it, unlawfully and injuriously causing them to be carried along the public street, it was moved in arrest of judgment, that this was not any offence; that the case differed materially from that of Rex v. Vantandillo, as it appeared that the defendant was by profession a person qualified to inoculate with this disease, if it were lawful for any person to inoculate with it. That as to its being alleged that the defendant caused the children to be carried along the street, it was no more than this, that he directed the patients to attend him for advice instead of visiting them, or that he prescribed what he might deem essential for their recovery, air, and exercise. And it was observed that in Rex v. Sutton, (h) which was an indictment for keeping an inoculating-house, and therefore much more likely to spread infection than what had been done here, the Court said that the defendant might demur. But Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, that the indictment laid the act to be done unlawfully and injuriously; and that in order to support this statement it must be shown, that what was done was, in the manner of doing it, incautious, and likely to affect the health of others. That the words unlawfully and injuriously precluded all legal cause of excuse. And Le Blanc, J., in passing sentence observed, that in all times it was unlawful and an indictable offence to expose persons infected with contagious disorders, and therefore liable to communicate them to the public, in a place of public resort. (i.)

By the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 29, s. 8, which was passed to extend the practice of vaccination, 'any person who shall from and after the passing of this Act (23 July, 1840) produce or attempt to produce in any person, by inoculation with variolous matter, or by wilful exposure to variolous matter, or to any matter, article, or thing, impregnated with variolous matter, or wilfully by any other means whatsoever produce the disease of small-pox in any person in England, Wales, or Ireland, shall be liable to be proceeded against and convicted summarily before any two or more justices of the peace in petty sessions assembled, and for every such offence shall, upon conviction, be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction for any term not exceeding one month.' And by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 100, vaccination was made compulsory, and penalties recoverable before two justices imposed on persons neglecting to comply with its provisions. (k)

The public health may be injured by selling unwholesome food; and it is an indictable offence to mix unwholesome ingredients in anything made and supplied for the food of man. And if a master knows that his servant puts into bread what the law has prohibited, and the servant, from the quantity he puts in, makes the bread unwholesome, the master is answerable criminally, for he should have taken care that more than is wholesome was not inserted. The indictment was against the contract baker for a military asylum, for delivering for the use of the children belonging to the asylum divers loaves containing noxious materials, which he knew. The evidence was that they contained crude lumps of alum, and that alum was an unwholesome ingredient, and that the defendant's foreman made the loaves: but the jury found that the defendant knew he used alum. Upon a motion for a new trial the Court thought, that if the master suffered the use of a prohibited article, it was his duty to take care that it was not used to a noxious extent, and that he was answerable if it was. A rule for arresting the judgment was then moved for, on the ground that the indictment did not specify what the noxious ingredients were, or state that the loaves were delivered to be eaten by the children: but the Court held the 'Victuallers, butchers, and other common dealers in victuals, are not merely in the same situation that common dealers in other commodities are, and liable under the same circumstances that they are, so that if an order be sent to them to be executed they are presumed to undertake to supply a good and merchantable article; but they are also liable to punishment for selling corrupt victuals, by virtue of an ancient statute, (m) certainly if they do so knowingly, and probably if they do not.' Selling un-

food in a market.

If a person publicly exposes or causes to be exposed for sale in a market meat unfit for human food as and for meat that is fit for human food, knowing it not to be so, he is indictable at common law. (o) But a person is not indictable at common law for sending meat unfit for human food to a salesman in a market, unless he intend it to be sold for human food. (p)

Bringing a
horse into a public place
is indictable.

It is an indictable offence at common law to bring a horse infected with the glanders into a public place to the danger of infecting the people there: and an indictment, which alleges that the defendant knew that a horse was infected with a contagious and infectious disease called the glanders, and that he brought it into a public place among divers subjects of the Queen to the great danger of infecting the said subjects with the said disease, is sufficient, after verdict, without alleging that the defendant knew that the disease was communicable to man. (q)

Administering
with intent to injure the health is not indictable at

Where an indictment alleged that the defendant mixed a large quantity of cantharides with rum, and gave the mixture to a woman with intent that she should drink it, and with intent thereby to injure her health, and that the woman, not knowing the cantharides to have been mixed with the rum, drank the mixture, whereby she became ill for a long space of time, and the facts corresponded with the statements in the indictment, Williams, J., after consulting Cresswell, J., held that the offence charged was not a misdemeanor at common law. It is also an indictable offence to convey the refuse of gas into a great public river, and thereby to render the waters corrupt, insalubrious, and unfit for the use of man, and the directors of a gas company are responsible for the acts done by their superintendent and engineer under a general authority to manage the works, though they are personally ignorant of the plan adopted, and though such plan be a departure from the original and understood method which the directors had no reason to suppose was discontinued: for if persons for their own advantage employ servants to conduct works, they are answerable for what is done by those servants. CHAPTER THE TENTH.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE REVENUE LAWS RELATING TO THE CUSTOMS OR EXCISE.

[111] AMONGST the offences against the revenue laws, that of smuggling is one of the principal. It consists in bringing on shore, or in carrying from the shore, goods, wares, or merchandise, for which the duty has not been paid, or goods of which the importation or exportation is prohibited: an offence productive of various mischiefs to society. (a) In order to prevent the commission of offences of this kind, many statutes were passed from time to time, which, in addition to the proceedings at common law for assaulting and obstructing revenue officers when acting in the execution of their duties, (b) gave to those officers extraordinary powers and protections, and punished persons endeavouring to resist or evade the laws relating to the customs and excise. The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, which consolidates the laws relating to the customs, makes various enactments relating to the forfeiture of vessels engaged in illegal traffic, and of uncustomed goods, which do not come within the scope of this treatise. But some of the enactments relating to the right to proceed to extremities, when necessary, for the purpose of seizing vessels liable to seizure, and the right to search for and seize goods liable to forfeiture, may properly be here mentioned. And the offence of making signals to smuggling vessels at sea, and the several offences declared to be felonies by this statute, require to be particularly noticed.

indemnified and discharged from any indictment, penalty, action, or other proceeding for so doing.' (c)

Sec. 219. 'Any officer or officers of the army, navy, or marines, duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, and on full pay, or any officer or officers of customs, producing his or their warrant or deputation (if required), may go on board any ship which shall be within the limits of any port of the United Kingdom, and rummage and search the cabin and all other parts of such ship for prohibited or uncustomed goods, and remain on board such ship so long as she shall continue within the limits of such port.'

Ships may be searched within the limits of the ports.

Sec. 220. 'Any officer of customs or excise, or other person acting in his or their aid, or duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, may, upon reasonable suspicion, stop and examine any cart, waggon, or other means of conveyance, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any smuggled goods are contained therein; and if no such goods shall be found, the officer or other person so stopping and examining such cart, waggon, or other conveyance, having had probable cause to suspect that such cart, waggon, or other conveyance had smuggled goods contained therein, shall not, on account of such stoppage and search, be liable to any prosecution or action at law on account thereof; and all persons driving or conducting such cart, waggon, or other conveyance, refusing to stop or allow any such examination when required in the Queen's name, shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds.'

Officers of customs may, on probable cause, stop carts, &c., and search for goods.

Sec. 221. 'Any officer of customs, or person acting under the direction of the commissioners of customs, having a writ of assistance issued from the Court of Exchequer, may, in the day-time, enter into and search (d) any house, shop, cellar, warehouse, room, or other place, and in case of resistance break open doors, chests, trunks, and other packages, and seize and bring away any uncustomed or prohibited goods, and put and secure the same in the Queen's warehouse, and may take with him any constable, headborough, police or other public officer, duly sworn as such, who may act as well without the limits of the parish or other place for which he shall be so sworn as within such limits; and all writs of assistance so issued shall continue in force during the reign for which they were granted, and for six months afterwards.'

Officers authorized by writ of assistance may search houses for uncustomed or prohibited goods.

Sec. 223. 'All ships and boats, and all goods whatsoever, liable to forfeiture, and all persons liable to be detained for any offence under this or any other Act relating to the customs, shall and may be seized or detained in any place, either upon land or water, by any officer or officers of Her Majesty's army, navy, or marines, duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, and on full pay, or by any officer or officers of customs or excise, or by any person having authority from the commissioners of customs or inland revenue to seize, or duly employed for the prevention of smuggling; and all ships, boats, and goods so seized shall, as soon as conveniently may be, be delivered into the care of the proper officer

Ships, boats, goods and persons may be seized or detained, and goods delivered to the proper officer.

(c) By sec. 357, 'ship shall mean ship or vessel of any description unless used to distinguish a ship from a sloop or some other description of vessel.'

(d) The power to search was introduced in consequence of Rex v. Watts,

1 B. & Ad. 166, where it was doubted whether that power existed under the 6 Geo. 4, c. 108, s. 40, and where it was also doubted whether the ordinary writ of assistance was not too general.

appointed to receive the same; and the forfeiture of any ship or boat shall be deemed to include her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the forfeiture of any goods shall be deemed to include the package in which the same are found, and all the contents thereof.'

It is not sufficient in an indictment to state that it was the duty of an officer to seize goods; the fact from which such duty arises, must be stated.

In a case under the 6 Geo. 4, c. 108, s. 34, which was similar to sec. 223 of the present Act, a count alleged that certain spirituous liquors were about to be imported, in respect of which certain duties would be payable, and that R. H. was a person employed in the service of the customs of our Lord the King, and that it was the duty of R. H., as such person so employed in the service of the customs as aforesaid, to arrest and detain all such goods and merchandizes as should within his knowledge be imported, which, upon such importation thereof, would become forfeited; and that the defendant unlawfully solicited R. H. to forbear to arrest and detain the said goods; it was objected, in arrest of judgment, that as the law did not cast upon all persons in the service of the customs the duty of making seizures, and the count did not show that H. was a person coming within any of the three classes described in sec. 34 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 108, the count was bad: and the Court held that the allegation that it was H.'s duty to seize goods, which upon importation were forfeited, was an allegation of matter of law. That being so, the facts from which that duty arose ought to have been stated in the count. If, indeed, it could be said to be the duty of every person employed in the service of the customs to seize such goods, then the allegation would have been sufficient. But it clearly was not the duty of every such person, and therefore the indictment was bad. (e)

Any person escaping may afterwards be detained.

Sec. 238. 'If any person liable to be detained under this or any other Act relating to the customs shall not be detained at the time of committing the offence for which he is so liable, or shall after detention make his escape, such person shall and may at any time afterwards be detained, and taken before any justice, to be dealt with as if detained at the time of committing such offence.'

Persons signalling smuggling vessels may be detained, and forfeit £100 or be kept to hard labour for one year.

Sec. 244. 'No person shall, after sunset and before sunrise between the twenty-first day of September and the first day of April, or after the hour of eight in the evening and before the hour of six in the morning at any other time of the year, make, aid, or assist in making any signal in or on board or from any ship or boat, or on or from any part of the coast or shore of the United Kingdom, or within six miles of any part of such coast or shore, for the purpose of giving notice to any person on board any smuggling ship or boat, whether any person so on board of such ship or boat be or not within distance to notice any such signal; and if any person, contrary to this Act, shall make or cause to be made, or aid or assist in making, any such signal, such person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; and any person may stop, arrest, and detain the person so offending, and convey him before any justice, who, if he see cause, shall commit the offender to the next county gaol, there to remain until delivered by due course of law; and it shall not be necessary to prove on any indictment or information in such case that any ship or boat was actually on the coast; and the offender, being duly convicted, shall, by order of the Court before whom he shall be convicted, either forfeit the penalty of one hundred pounds, or, at the discretion of such Court, be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any term not exceeding one year.' (f)

Where an indictment upon the 6 Geo. 4, c. 108, s. 52, which was similar to sec. 244 of the present Act, stated that the defendants between sunset on the 8th and sunrise on the 9th of March, that is to say, on the morning of the said 9th of March about three o'clock, did make certain lights, &c.; it was proved that the lights were made on the morning of the 9th, and it was objected that the indictment did not state the offence to have been committed between the 21st of September and the 1st of April, and that the allegation that the offence was committed on the 9th of March was not sufficient, because the prosecutor was not bound to the day laid; but might prove the offence to have taken place on any other day; that the time was of the essence of the offence, and therefore it ought to have formed a distinct and substantive averment in the words of the Act; but it was held that the day having been proved as laid, the objection could only properly be made in arrest of judgment, and even then it was no valid objection; for judicial notice must be taken that the day averred in the indictment is, in fact, within the period mentioned in the statute, and therefore the indictment was good. (g)

Sec. 245. 'If any person be charged with or indicted for having made or caused to be made, or for aiding or assisting in making, any such signal as aforesaid, the burden of proof that such signal so charged as having been made with intent and for the purpose of giving such notice as aforesaid was not made with such intent and for such purpose shall be upon the defendant against whom such charge is made or such indictment is found.'

Sec. 246. 'Any person whatsoever may prevent any signal being made as aforesaid, and may go upon any lands for that purpose, without being liable to any indictment, suit, or action for the same.'

Sec. 247. 'All persons assembled, to the number of three or more, for the purpose of unshipping, carrying, conveying, or concealing any spirits or tobacco, or any tea or silk (such tea or silk being of the value of ten pounds or more), liable to forfeiture under this or any other Act relating to the customs or excise, and every person who shall by any means procure or hire, or shall depute or authorize any other person to procure or hire, any person or persons to assemble for the purpose of being concerned in the landing or unshipping, or carrying, conveying, or concealing

Any person may prevent signals, and enter lands for that purpose.

Persons assembling to the number of three or more to run spirits, tobacco, &c., or obstructing officers, to be sent to house of correction to hard labour.

Dean*, 12 M. & W. 39; and per Alderson, B., 'We must look at the statute

Three or more armed persons assembled to land or rescue smuggled goods guilty of felony.

Sec. 248. Persons shooting at boats belonging to navy or revenue service, guilty of felony.

any officer of customs or excise, or any person acting in his aid or assistance, or duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, in the execution of his office or duty, every person so offending, and every person aiding, abetting, or assisting therein, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court before which he shall be convicted, to be transported (k) beyond the seas for the term of his natural life, or for any term not less than fifteen (l) years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three years.'

Sec. 250. 'If any person, in company with more than four others, be found with any goods liable to forfeiture under this or any other Act relating to the customs or excise, or in company with one other person, within five miles of the sea coast or of any tidal river, and carrying offensive arms or weapons, or disguised in any way, every such person shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction of such offence, be transported (k) as a felon for the term of seven years.' (m)

Any person, in company with four others, having smuggled goods, or with one other, armed or disguised, guilty of felony.

Sec. 251. 'If any person shall, by force or violence, assault, resist, or obstruct any officer of the army, navy, or marines, being duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, and on full pay, or any officer of customs or excise, or other person duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, in the due execution of his or their duty, or any person acting in his or their aid, every person so offending, being thereof convicted, shall be transported (k) for seven years, (m) or sentenced to be imprisoned in any house of correction or common gaol, and kept to hard labour, for any term not exceeding three years, at the discretion of the Court before whom such offender shall be tried and convicted as aforesaid.'

Persons assaulting officers by force or violence may be transported.

Sec. 275. 'Where any offence shall be committed in any place upon the water not being within any county of the United Kingdom, or where the officers have any doubt whether such place is within the boundaries or limits of any such county, such offence shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed and taken to be an offence committed on the high seas; and for the purpose of giving jurisdiction under this Act every offence shall be deemed to have been committed, and every cause of complaint to have arisen, either in the place in which the same actually was committed or arose, or in any place on land where the offender or person complained against may be or be brought.'

Offences on the waters, &c., and jurisdiction.

Sec. 301. 'No indictment shall be preferred for any offence against this or any other Act or Acts relating to the customs or excise, nor shall any suit be commenced for the recovery of any penalty or forfeiture for any such offence, except in the cases of persons detained and carried before one or more justices in pursuance of such Act or Acts as aforesaid, unless such indictment shall be preferred under the direction of the commissioners of customs or inland revenue, or unless such suit shall be commenced in the name of Her Majesty's Attorney-General for Indictment to be preferred by order of the Commissioners and suits to be in the name of the Attorney-General or Lord Advocate or of some officer.

England or Ireland, or in the name of the Lord Advocate of Scotland, or in the name of some officer of customs or excise, under the direction of the said commissioners respectively.'

Within what time suits, indictments, or informations are to be exhibited.

Sec. 303. 'All suits, indictments, or informations brought or exhibited for any offence against this or any other Act relating to the customs in any Court, or before any justice or justices, shall be brought or exhibited within three years next after the date of the offence committed.'

Indictments or informations may be tried in any county in England, Scotland, or Ireland.

Sec. 304. 'Any indictment, prosecution, or information which may be instituted or brought under the direction of the commissioners of customs relating to the customs shall and may be inquired of, examined, tried, and determined in any county of England when the offence is committed in England, and in any county of Scotland when the offence is committed in Scotland, and in any county in Ireland when the offence is committed in Ireland, in such manner and form as if the offence had been committed in the said county where the said indictment or information shall be tried.'

Defendant's proofs.

Sec. 305. 'If in any prosecution under the direction of the commissioners of customs in respect of any goods seized for nonpayment of duties, or any other cause of forfeiture, or for the recovering any penalty or penalties under this or any Act relating to the customs, any dispute shall arise whether the duties of customs or excise have been paid in respect of such goods, or the same have been lawfully imported or lawfully unshipped, or concerning the place from whence such goods were brought, then and in every such case the proof thereof shall be on the defendant in such prosecution.'

Averments in smuggling cases.

Sec. 306. 'The averment that the commissioners of customs or inland revenue have directed or elected that any information or proceedings under this or any other Act relating to the customs or excise shall be instituted, or that any ship or boat is foreign or belonging wholly or in part to Her Majesty's subjects, or that any person detained or found on board any ship or boat liable to seizure is or is not a subject of Her Majesty, or that any goods thrown overboard, staved, or destroyed were so thrown overboard, staved, or destroyed to prevent seizure, or that any goods thrown overboard, staved, or destroyed when chased by any ship or boat in Her Majesty's service, or in the service of the revenue, were so thrown overboard, staved, or destroyed to avoid seizure, or that any person is an officer of customs or excise, or that any person was employed for the prevention of smuggling, or that the offence was committed within the limits of any port, or where the offence is committed in any port of the United Kingdom, the naming of such port in any information or proceedings, shall be deemed to be sufficient, without proof of such fact or facts, unless the defendant in any such case shall prove to the contrary.'

Vivâ voce evidence may be given that a party is an officer.

Sec. 307. 'If upon any trial a question shall arise whether any person is an officer of the army, navy, or marines being duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, and on full pay, or an officer of customs or excise, his own evidence thereof, or other evidence of his having acted as such shall be deemed sufficient, and such person shall not be required to produce his commission or deputation unless sufficient proof shall be given to the contrary ;

and every such officer and any person acting in his aid or assistance shall be deemed a competent witness upon the trial of any suit or information on account of any seizure or penalty as aforesaid, notwithstanding such officer or other person may be entitled to the whole or any part of such seizure or penalty, or to any reward upon the conviction of the party charged in such suit or information.'

Witness competent although entitled to part of seizure or reward.

Sec. 308. 'Upon the trial of any issue, or upon any judicial hearing or investigation touching any seizure, penalty, or forfeiture, or other proceeding under any law or laws relating to the customs or excise, or incident thereto, where it may be necessary to give proof of any order issued by the commissioners of the Treasury, or by the commissioners of customs or inland revenue respectively, the order, or any letter or instructions referring thereto, which shall have been officially received by any officer of customs or excise for his government, and under which he shall have acted as such officer, shall be admitted and taken as sufficient evidence and proof of such order.'

What shall be deemed sufficient evidence of an order of the Treasury or of the commissioners of customs or inland revenue.

Upon a clause in the 52 Geo. 3, c. 143, s. 11 (now repealed), which was similar to sec. 249 of the present Act, it was determined that where a custom-house vessel had chased a smuggler and fired into her without hoisting the pendant and ensign then required by the 56 Geo. 3, c. 104, s. 8, the returning such fire was not malicious. The indictment was for shooting at a vessel in the service of the customs on the high seas, within one hundred leagues of the coast of Great Britain; and also for maliciously shooting at an officer of the customs, &c. It appeared that the vessel chased a smuggler within the limits; the smuggler did not bring to upon being chased and a signal-gun fired; whereupon the custom-house vessel fired at the smuggler, and the smuggler returned the fire, and they had a regular engagement, in which one of the custom-house officers was severely wounded. In order to prove the right of firing at the smuggler, the 56 Geo. 3, c. 104, s. 8, was referred to, which, in the case of ships employed to prevent smuggling by the Treasury, Admiralty, Customs, or Excise, gave the power, if the vessel had a pendant and ensign hoisted of such description as his Majesty by any order in council, or by royal proclamation under the great seal, should direct; but there had been no proclamation, nor was any order in council proved; though, after the trial, an order in council was discovered which required certain particulars in the pendant and ensign which this ship's pendant and ensign had not. Upon a case reserved, eleven judges (Best, J., being absent) were clear that, as the custom-house vessel had not complied with what was required to make her shooting legal, the smuggler's firing was not in law malicious. Upon a clause in the 19 Geo. 2, c. 34 (now repealed), similar to sec. 248 of the present Act, which relates to offences committed by persons, to the number of three or more, armed with firearms, or other offensive weapons, it was decided that in order to bring offenders within its penalties, it was necessary that they should be armed with weapons which might properly be called offensive. (o)

What shall be deemed an offensive weapon.

(n) Rex v. Reynolds, Mich. T. 1821.
MS. Bayley, J. R. & R. 465.

(o) Hutchinson's case, 1 Leach, 342.

It seems that a person catching up a hatchet accidentally, during the hurry and heat of an affray, was not armed with an offensive weapon within the meaning of that Act; (p) and in one case it was held, that large sticks about three feet long, with large knobs at the end, with several prongs, the natural growth of the stick, arising out of them, were not offensive weapons; and that, from the preamble of the statute, the weapons must be such as the law calls dangerous. (q) But in a subsequent case, the Court said, that although it was difficult to say what should or should not be called an offensive weapon, it would be going a great deal too far to say that nothing but guns, pistols, daggers, and instruments of war, should be so considered; and that bludgeons properly so called, clubs, and anything that was not in common use for any other purpose but a weapon, were clearly offensive weapons within the meaning of the Legislature. (r) In a case upon a former statute (9 Geo. 2, c. 35, s. 10), where the same words, 'armed with firearms, or other offensive arms or weapons,' occurred, it was held that a person armed only with a common whip was not an offender within the meaning of the Act; though he aided and assisted other persons who were armed with firearms and weapons which were clearly offensive. (s) But with respect to the latter part of this judgment, a different doctrine appears to have been held by Lord Mansfield upon the 19 Geo. 2, c. 34, who is reported to have said, that where a person was assembled together with others who were armed, and was active, it was not necessary that such individual should be armed. (t)

Where a number of persons were assembled for the purpose of landing smuggled goods, and they were, as is usual on such occasions, divided into two different parties, one called the company, who had bats in their hands for the purpose of carrying the tubs of spirits (which bats were hop-poles about seven feet in length), and the other called the protecting party, who were armed with muskets; and the prisoner was one of the company, and carried a bat, but he did not strike any one with it, but some of the men with bats struck some of the preventive men; as the bats might be used for offensive purposes, it was left to the jury to say whether the bats were offensive weapons or not. (u)

Upon the 7 Geo. 2, c. 21 (now repealed), by which any person who should, with an offensive weapon or instrument, assault with intent to rob, was made guilty of felony, it was decided that the words 'offensive weapon or instrument,' would apply to a stick, though not of extraordinary size, and though it might in general have been used as a walking-stick. An indictment was for assaulting with an offensive weapon, viz., a stick, with intent to rob; and it appeared that the stick was like a common walking stick, about a yard long, and not very thick, but that the prisoner, when he came up to the prosecutor, struck him violently on the head with it, so as to cut his head and make it bleed; and two of the prisoner's comrades afterwards came up and beat the prosecutor on the head with similar sticks. Holroyd, J., told the jury, that as the prisoner had used the stick as a weapon of offence, he thought it ought to be considered as an offensive weapon; and the jury having convicted the prisoner, the judges agreed with Holroyd, J., and held the conviction right. (v) And in a similar case on the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 9 (the Night Poaching Act), it was held to be a question for the jury whether the prisoner had taken out a stick, large enough to be called a bludgeon, which he, being lame, was in the habit of using as a crutch, with intent to use it as an offensive weapon, or merely for the purpose to which he usually applied it. (w) From a case upon the same repealed statute (7 Geo. 2, c. 21,) where the indictment was for assaulting with a certain offensive weapon called a wooden staff, and the evidence proved a violent blow with a great stone, as it was holden that the conviction of the prisoner was proper, it appears to follow that both a wooden staff and a great stone were considered as offensive weapons within the meaning of that statute. (x)

(r) Cosan's case. In this case it was contended, upon the authority of Ince's case, that very large club sticks, such as people ride with, to defend themselves, are not offensive weapons. 1 Leach, 342, 343, note (a).

The term, weapon, would seem to include any instrument of metal or wood, or any club, stone, or other thing which is had for the purpose of effecting an injury on the person, according to the doctrine of the Roman law, Teli appellatione et ferrum, et fustis, et lapis, et denique omne quod nocendi causâ habetur, significatur. (y)

As to the assembling, it was determined upon the repealed statute (19 Geo. 2, c. 34), that it must be deliberate, and for the purpose of committing the offence described in the statute. So that where a set of drunken men came from an alehouse, and hastily set themselves to carry away some Geneva which had been seized by the excise officers, it was thought very questionable whether the object which the Legislature had in view could be extended to such a case; and the Court said, that the words of the statute manifestly alluded to the circumstance of great multitudes of persons coming down upon the beach of the sea for the purpose of escorting uncustomed goods to the places designed for their reception. (z)

As to the assembling.

Upon a clause of the repealed statute (9 Geo. 2, c. 35, s. 26), by which it was enacted, that an assault committed upon any of the officers of the customs and excise should be tried in any county in England, in such manner and form as if the offence had been therein committed, it was decided that the provision extended only to revenue officers, qua officers: and a defendant having been found guilty, on an indictment, of a common assault on the prosecutor, who was an excise officer, the Court of King's Bench arrested the judgment, though the prosecutor was described to be an excise officer, the offence being laid in Surrey, and the venue in Middlesex. CHAPTER THE ELEVENTH.

OF HINDERING THE EXPORTATION OF CORN, OR PREVENTING ITS CIRCULATION WITHIN THE KINGDOM.

THE 11 Geo. 2, c. 22, s. 1, reciting that persons had assembled in great numbers, committed great violences, and done many injuries, with intent to hinder the exportation of corn, whereby many of his Majesty's subjects had been deterred from buying corn and grain, and following their lawful business therein, to their great loss and damage, as well as to the great damage and prejudice of the farmers and landholders of this kingdom, and of the nation in general, enacts, 'that if any person or persons [shall wilfully and maliciously beat, wound, or use any other violence to or upon any person or persons, with intent to deter or hinder him or them from buying of corn or grain in any market, or other place within this kingdom;] (a) or shall unlawfully stop or seize upon any waggon, cart, or other carriage, or horse loaded with wheat, flour, meal, malt, or other grain, in or on the way to or from any city, market-town, or sea-port, of this kingdom; and wilfully and maliciously break, cut, separate, or destroy, the same or any part thereof, or the harness of the horses drawing the same; or shall unlawfully take off, drive away, kill, or wound, any of such horses; [or unlawfully beat or wound the driver or drivers of such waggon, cart, or other carriage, or horse, so loaded, in order to stop the same;] (a) or shall by cutting of the sacks, or otherwise, scatter or throw abroad such wheat, flour, meal, malt, or other grain; or shall take or carry away, spoil or damage, the same, or any part thereof;' such offenders, being convicted before two justices of the peace of the county, &c., in which the offence is committed, or before the justices of the peace in open sessions (who are thereby authorized and empowered summarily and finally to hear and determine the same), shall be sent to the common gaol, or to the house of correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding three months, nor less than one month; and shall by the same justices be also ordered to be once publicly whipped by the master or keeper of the gaol or house of correction in such city, market-town, or sea-port, in or near to which such offence shall be committed, at the market-cross or market-place there, between the hours of eleven and two o'clock.

By sec. 2 ['if any person or persons so convicted, shall commit any of the offences aforesaid, a second time;] (a) or if any person or persons shall wilfully and maliciously pull, throw down, or otherwise destroy, any storehouse or granary, or other place where corn shall be then kept in order to be exported; or shall unlawfully enter any such storehouse, granary, or other place, and take and

Persons using violence to deter others from buying corn within the kingdom, or stopping any corn, breaking waggons, &c., carrying corn, or taking off the horses, or beating the drivers, or taking corn, to be imprisoned.

Persons committing these offences a second time, or with intent to prevent corn, &c., from being carry away any corn, flour, meal, or grain therefrom; or shall throw abroad, or spoil the same, or any part thereof; or shall unlawfully enter on board any ship, barge, boat, or vessel, and shall wilfully and maliciously take and carry away, cast or throw out therefrom, or otherwise spoil or damage, any meal, flour, wheat, or grain, therein intended for exportation; every such offender being convicted, shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and transported (b) for seven (c) years; and if such offender shall return before the expiration of the seven years, he or she shall suffer death as a felon without benefit of clergy. (d)

The 36 Geo. 3, c. 9, s. 1, reciting that persons had assembled themselves in great numbers, and committed great violences, with intent to hinder the passage of corn and grain from place to place, whereby the necessary circulation of corn and grain within the kingdom might be prevented; enacts, that if any person or persons shall [wilfully and maliciously beat, wound, or use any other violence to or upon any person or persons with intent to deter or hinder him or them from buying of corn or grain in any market, or other place within this kingdom;] (e) or shall unlawfully stop or seize any wheat, flour, malt, or other grain, in or on the way to or from any city, market-town, or place in this kingdom; or shall wilfully and maliciously break, cut, or destroy any waggon, cart, or other carriage, wherein any such wheat, flour, meal, malt, or other grain, shall be loaded, or the harness of any horse or horses drawing or carrying the same; or shall unlawfully take off from any such carriage, or drive away, kill, or wound, any such horse or horses; [or unlawfully beat or wound the driver or drivers of any such waggon, cart, or such other carriage or horse so loaded, with intent to stop such wheat, flour, meal, malt, or other grain;] (e) or shall, by cutting of the sacks or otherwise, scatter or throw abroad any such wheat, flour, meal, malt, or other grain; or shall take or carry away, destroy, spoil, or damage, the same or any part thereof; such offenders being convicted before two justices of the peace of the county, &c., wherein the offence is committed, or before the justices of the peace in open sessions (who are thereby authorised and empowered summarily and finally to hear and determine the same), shall be sent to the common gaol, or house of correction, to be kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding three months, nor less than one month.

By sec. 2 [if any such person or persons so convicted shall commit any of the offences aforesaid, a second time;] (e) or if any person or persons with intent to prevent or hinder any corn, meal, flour, malt, or grain, from being lawfully carried or removed from any place whatsoever, shall wilfully and maliciously pull, throw down, or otherwise destroy, any storehouse or granary, or other

OF ADMINISTERING OR TAKING UNLAWFUL OATHS.

37 Geo. 3,
c. 123, s. 1,
administering unlawful oaths felony.

Taking such oaths felony.

This statute is not confined to oaths administered for seditious or mutinous purposes.

THE 37 Geo. 3, c. 123, s. 1, recites, that wicked and evil disposed persons had attempted to seduce his Majesty's forces and subjects from their duty and allegiance, and to incite them to acts of mutiny and sedition; and had endeavoured to give effect to their wicked and traitorous proceedings, by imposing upon the persons whom they had attempted to seduce the pretended obligation of oaths unlawfully administered. From this preamble it appears as if the statute were mainly directed against combinations for purposes of mutiny and sedition: but in the enacting part, after dealing with offences of that description, it goes on in much more extensive terms, and embraces other more general objects. It enacts, 'that any person or persons who shall in any manner or form whatsoever administer, or cause to be administered, or be aiding or assisting at, or present at, and consenting to, the administering or taking of any oath or engagement, purporting or intending to bind the person taking the same to engage in any mutinous or seditious purpose; or to disturb the public peace; or to be of any association, society, or confederacy, formed for any such purpose; or to obey the orders or commands of any committee or body of men not lawfully constituted, or of any leader or commander, or other person not having authority by law for that purpose; or not to inform or give evidence against any associate, confederate, or other person; or not to reveal or discover any unlawful combination or confederacy; or not to reveal or discover any illegal act done or to be done; or not to reveal or discover any illegal oath or engagement which may have been administered or tendered to or taken by such person or persons, or to or by any other person or persons, or the import of any such oath or engagement;' shall on conviction be adjudged guilty of felony, and be transported (a) for any term not exceeding seven (b) years; 'and every person who shall take any such oath or engagement, not being compelled thereto, shall, on conviction, be adjudged guilty of felony, and may be transported (a) for any term not exceeding seven (b) years.'

In one case a question was made, whether the unlawful administering of an oath by an associated body of men to a person, purporting to bind him not to reveal or discover an unlawful combination or conspiracy of persons, nor any illegal act done by them, (c) was within this statute; the object of the association being a conspiracy to raise wages and make regulations in a certain trade, and not to stir up mutiny or sedition. It was contended, that the words of the statute, however large in themselves, must be confined to the objects stated in the preamble; and could not have been intended to reach a case where it was plain that the fact arose entirely out of a private dispute between persons engaged in the same trade, and was confined in its object to that alone; and that the general words therefore must be construed with relation to the antecedent offences, which are confined in their objects to mutiny and sedition. But the Court, though they did not upon the particular circumstances feel themselves called upon to give an express decision, appear to have entertained no doubt but that the case was within the statute. (d)

So where sixteen persons, with their faces blackened, met at a house at night, having guns with them, and intending to go out for the purpose of night poaching, and were all sworn not to betray their companions, and it was objected that this oath was not within the statute, as it was not for a mutinous or seditious object, and that the statute only prohibited those oaths of secrecy which related to some illegal act, and that the word 'illegal' imported a criminal act and not a mere civil trespass, whereas it was a mere civil trespass which was contemplated at the time when the oath was administered, it was held that the oath was within the statute; and as to the assembly itself, and its object, it was impossible that a meeting to go out with faces thus disguised, at night, and under such circumstances, could be other than an unlawful assembly: in which case, the oath to keep it secret was an oath prohibited by the statute. (e) So where an oath was administered to the members of a trades' union, binding them not to make buttons for less than the lodge prices, and not to divulge the secrets of the lodge, it was held that this was an oath within the statute, for to administer an oath or engagement not to reveal the secrets of any association is within the 37 Geo. 3, c. 137, as explained by subsequent statutes, not because it has reference to any matter respecting wages, but on the ground that every association of that kind, bound together by an oath, not to disclose the proceedings of that society, is for that reason an unlawful combination within the statutes. (f)

So where an oath not to reveal what they saw or heard was administered by members of an association, which was formed for the purpose of raising wages by a general strike on the part of its members, and for other purposes in furtherance of that design, it was held that it was within the 37 Geo. 3, c. 123. (g)

The 52 Geo. 3, c. 104, s. 1, which was passed to render the foregoing Act more effectual in respect to oaths of a particular nature, enacts, 'that every person who shall in any manner or form whatsoever administer, or cause to be administered, or be aiding or assisting at the administering of any oath or engagement, purporting or intending to bind the person taking the same to commit any treason or murder, or any felony punishable by law with death,' shall, on conviction, be adjudged guilty of felony, and suffer death as a felon without benefit of clergy; (h) and every person who shall take any such oath or engagement, not being compelled thereto,' shall, on conviction, be adjudged guilty of felony, and be transported (hh) for life, or for such term of years as the court shall adjudge.

But persons taking the oaths mentioned in either of these Acts by compulsion must make a full disclosure of the fact, and the circumstances attending it, within a limited time, in order to be justified or excused. The 37 Geo. 3, c. 123, s. 2, enacts, 'that compulsion shall not justify or excuse any person taking such oath or engagement, unless he or she shall, within four days after the taking thereof, if not prevented by actual force or sickness, and then within four days after the hindrance produced by such force or sickness shall cease, declare the same, together with the whole of what he or she shall know touching the same, and the person or persons by whom, and in whose presence, and when and where, such oath or engagement was administered or taken, by information on oath before one of his Majesty's justices of the peace, or one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state, or his Majesty's privy council: or in case the person taking such oath or engagement shall be in actual service in his Majesty's forces by sea or land, then by such information on oath as aforesaid, or by information to his commanding officer.' The 52 Geo. 3, c. 104, s. 2, contains a similar enactment as to the oaths or engagements within that Act, except that the words 'fourteen days' are substituted for 'four days.'

By the 37 Geo. 3, c. 123, s. 5, any engagement or obligation whatsoever in the nature of an oath, and by the 52 Geo. 3, c. 104, s. 6, any engagement or obligation whatsoever in the nature of an oath purporting or intending to bind the person taking the same to commit any treason or murder, or any felony punishable by law with death, shall be deemed an oath within the intent and meaning of those Acts, in whatever form or manner the same shall be administered or taken: and whether the same shall be actually administered by any person or persons to any other person or persons, or taken by any person or persons without any administration thereof by any other person or persons.

If the oath administered was intended to make the party believe himself under an engagement, it is equally within the Act, whether the book made use of be a testament or not. (i) So the precise form of the oath is immaterial; it is an oath within the meaning the Acts, if it was understood by the party tendering, and by the party taking it, as having the force and obligation of an oath. (k)

With respect to persons aiding and assisting at the administering or taking these unlawful oaths, the 37 Geo. 3, c. 123, s. 3, enacts, that persons aiding and assisting at, or present and consenting to, the administering or taking of any oath or engagement before mentioned in that Act; and persons causing any such oath or engagement to be administered or taken, though not present at the administering or taking thereof, shall be deemed principal offenders, and tried as such; although the person or persons who actually administered such oath or engagement, if any such there shall be, shall not have been tried or convicted. A similar enactment is contained in the 52 Geo. 3, c. 104, s. 4, with respect to persons aiding and assisting at the administering of any oath or engagement mentioned in that Act, and persons causing any such oath or engagement to be administered, though not present at the administering thereof: such persons are to be deemed principal offenders, and, on conviction, to be adjudged guilty of felony, and to suffer death without benefit of clergy, (l) although the person or persons who actually administered the oath or engagement, if any such there shall be, shall not have been tried or convicted.

Both the statutes provide that it shall not be necessary to set forth in the indictment 'the words of the oath or engagement;' and that 'it shall be sufficient to set forth the purport of such oath or engagement, or some material part thereof.' (m) Upon an indictment on the 37 Geo. 3, the fourth count charged, that the defendants administered to J. H. an oath 'intended to bind him not to inform or give evidence against any member of a certain society formed to disturb the public peace for any act or expression of his or theirs, done or made collectively or individually, in or out of that or other similar societies, in pursuance of the spirit of that obligation;' and the eighth count stated the oath to be 'intended to bind the said J. H. not to give evidence against any associate in certain associations and societies of persons formed for seditious purposes:' and the other counts stated the objects of the oath administered, and the objects of the society, differently and more generally adapted to several prohibitory parts of the statute. Upon objection taken at the trial to the generality of the statements in the indictment, Lord Avonley was of opinion that the Act intended that it should be sufficient to allege and prove what the object of the oath and engagement was, without stating any words at all; and that the offence being described in the words of the Act, was well described: but that supposing the objection made to the generality of the counts was good, which he did not admit, yet that in the fourth and eighth a material part of the oath or engagement was set forth according to the clause of the Act. The point was submitted to the judges, who, without giving any opinion against the other counts, all agreed that at any rate the fourth and eighth counts were good. (n)

Persons aiding and assisting, or persons causing such oaths to be taken, though not present when they are taken, are principals.

In the indictment it is sufficient to set forth the purport of the oath or engagement.

If the indictment state the oath to have been not to inform or give evidence against any person belonging to a confederacy of persons associated together to do 'a certain illegal act,' it is sufficient without going on to state what the illegal act was. For the offence is not the illegal act, but the administration of the oath, which preceded it, and all that the rules of pleading require is that the offence—that is the oath itself—should be sufficiently set out. (o) Where an indictment charged that the prisoner administered 'a certain oath' to J. Penny, and fifteen others, naming them, and it was proved that the sixteen were all sworn in the same manner, on the same book, two or three at a time, at the same meeting, it was held that this was sufficient, for it was the same act of administering. Or it might be taken to be a complete transaction with respect to each person sworn; and the charge would be substantiated by evidence of the prisoner having sworn any one of the party, in the same way as a man may be convicted of larceny on proof of stealing one out of several articles named in an indictment. (p)

Evidence—
It is not necessary to produce a paper from which it is supposed that the oath was read. And parol evidence may be given to explain the nature of the oath.

Where the witness, swearing to the words spoken by way of oath by the prisoner when he administered it, said that he held a paper in his hand at the time when he administered the oath, from which paper it was supposed that he read the words; it was held, that parol evidence of what he in fact said was sufficient, without giving him notice to produce such paper. (q) And where the oath on the face of it did not purport to be for a seditious purpose, though it was objected that no parol evidence could be given to show that the 'brotherhood' mentioned in it was of a seditious nature, it was held that declarations made at the time by the party administering such oath were admissible to prove the real object of it. (r)

Place of trial.

Both the 37 Geo. 3 and 52 Geo. 3, provide that offences committed on the high seas, or out of the realm, or in England, shall be tried before any court of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery for any county in England in such manner and form as if such offence had been therein committed; and that offences committed in Scotland shall be tried either before the Justiciary Court at Edinburgh, or in any of the circuit courts in that part of the United Kingdom. (s)

Persons tried not liable to be tried for the same fact as high treason.

It is also provided by both these statutes that any person who shall be tried and acquitted or convicted of any offence against the Acts, shall not be liable to be prosecuted again for the same offence or fact as high treason, or misprision of high treason. And further, that nothing in the Acts contained shall be construed to extend to prevent any person guilty of any offence against the Acts, and who shall not be tried for the same as an offence against the Acts, from being tried for the same, as high treason, or misprision of high treason, in such manner as if those Acts had not been made. (v)

Societies taking unlawful oaths, &c., to be deemed unlawful combinations and confederacies.

The mutual promises and engagements of societies are lawful, unless they are clearly prohibited by law; and it lies on the party who alleges that such promises and engagements are illegal to prove that they are so. Where, therefore, it appeared from the rules of a lodge of Oddfellows that the members entered into an engagement to abide by the rules, and one of the rules was to keep the secrets of the society; but all secrets had been abolished; and the rules had not been enrolled: Erle, J., held that there was nothing to show that the engagement was illegal; the subjects of this realm might enter into any engagement they pleased, unless prohibited by law, and the party objecting to the legality of an engagement must show that it is illegal. (w)

With respect to the administering or taking unlawful oaths in Ireland, the 50 Geo. 3, c. 102, enacts, 'that any person or persons who shall administer, or cause to be administered, tender, or cause to be tendered, or be present aiding and assisting at the administering or tendering, or who shall by threats, promises, persuasions, or other undue means, cause, procure, or induce to be taken by any person or persons in Ireland, upon a book or otherwise, any oath or engagement importing to bind the person or persons taking the same to be of any association, brotherhood, committee, society, or confederacy whatsoever, in reality formed, or to be formed, for seditious purposes, or to disturb the public peace, or to injure the persons or property of any person or persons whatsoever, or to compel any person or persons whatsoever to do, or omit, or refuse to do, any act or acts whatsoever, under whatever name, description, or pretence such association, brotherhood, committee, society, or confederacy shall assume, or pretend to be formed or constituted, or any oath or engagement importing to bind the person taking the same to obey the orders, or rules, or commands, of any

This statute further enacts, that a person compelled by inevitable necessity to commit any of these offences, shall be excused and justified upon proof of such necessity, if within ten days (not being prevented by actual force or sickness, and then within seven days after such actual force or sickness shall cease to disable him), he disclose to a justice of peace, by information on oath, the whole of what he knows touching his compulsion. (z) Persons aiding at the administering or tendering the oath or engagement, and persons causing the oath or engagement to be administered or tendered, though not present, are to be deemed principal offenders, and tried as such, though the person who actually administered such oath or engagement shall not have been tried or convicted. By the 4 Geo. 4, c. 87, s. 1, every society, &c., in Ireland, the members whereof shall, according to the rules, &c., be required or admitted, or permitted to take any oath or engagement, which shall be an unlawful oath or engagement, within the statute 50 Geo. 3, c. 102, or to take any oath not required or authorised by law, are declared to be unlawful combinations and confederacies.

The provisions of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 87, were extended by the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 74, to certain other societies therein described, and these Acts are continued by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 32, for five years from the 7th of July, 1862, and until the end of the then next session of Parliament.

It has been doubted whether an indictment can be sustained for administering an oath contrary to this clause, and, supposing it can, such an indictment is bad unless it set out so much at least of the oath as may enable the Court to see that the oath is one which is prohibited by the clause. An indictment alleged in several counts that the defendant administered a voluntary oath touching certain matters whereof he had not jurisdiction by any statute, and some counts negatived the oaths, &c., in the proviso; and the Court of Queen's Bench held that the indictment was bad; for the having or not having jurisdiction is a matter of law depending upon the facts, upon which the Court is to form an opinion. There ought, therefore, to be a distinct allegation of the subject matter of the oath, showing affirmatively that it was out of the jurisdiction. But the Court expressed no opinion whether the indictment would lie; Lord Denman, C. J., however, seems to have thought that it would be necessary to show that the disobedience was wilful and in the nature of a contempt, in order to convict a person of disobeying the clause. (a)

An indictment for administering an unlawful oath must state the substance of the oath. Quare, whether such an indictment can be sustained.

(a) Reg. v. Nott, 4 Q. B. 768. The majority of the Court thought that it was not necessary to set out the whole oath; but the 37 Geo. 3, c. 123, and 52 Geo. 3, c. 104, contain express provisions to that effect (ante, p. 189), and, therefore, it would certainly be prudent to set out the whole oath, if practicable, in some counts.

CHAPTER THE THIRTEENTH.

OF MISPRISION OF FELONY, AND OF COMPOUNDING OFFENCES.

Of misprision or concealment of felony.

By misprision of felony, is generally understood the concealment of felony, or a procuring such concealment, whether it be felony by the common law, or by statute. (a) Thus, silently to observe the commission of a felony without using any endeavour to apprehend the offender, is a misprision; (b) for a man is bound to discover the crime of another to a magistrate with all possible expedition, (c) as the law does not allow any private person to forego a prosecution on any account. (d) But there must be knowledge merely without any assent; for if a man assent to a felony, he will be either principal or accessory. (e) The punishment of this offence in an officer is imposed by the statute of Westminster, 3 Edw. 1, c. 9, which enacts, that ‘if the sheriff, coroner, or any other bailiff within a franchise, or without, for reward, or for prayer, or for fear, or for any manner of affinity, conceal, consent or procure to conceal, the felonies done in their liberties; or otherwise will not attach nor arrest such felons there (as they may), or otherwise will not do their office, for favour borne to such misdoers, and be attainted thereof, they shall have one year’s imprisonment, and after make a grievous fine at the Kings’ pleasure, if they have wherewith; and if they have not whereof, they shall have imprisonment of three years.’ The punishment, in the case of a common person, is imprisonment for a less discretionary time; and in both cases fine and ransom at the King’s pleasure. (f) By the 3 Hen. 7, c. 1, the justices of every shire may take an inquest to inquire of the concealments of other inquests, of such matters and offences as are to be inquired and presented before justices of the peace, whereof complaint shall be made by bill; and if such concealment be found of any inquest within a year after the concealment, every person of the inquest is to be amerced for the concealment by discretion of the justices.

Of compounding felony, or theft-bote.

Of a similar nature to this offence of misprision of felony, is the offence of compounding of felony, mentioned in the books by the more ancient appellation of theft-bote, which is where the party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or other amends, upon agreement not to prosecute. (g) It is said to have been anciently punishable as felony; but is now punished only with fine and imprisonment, unless it be accompanied with some degree of maintenance given to the felon, which makes the party an accessory after the fact. (h) But the barely taking again one's own goods which have been stolen, is no offence at all unless some favour be shown to the thief. (i)

Compounding a mere charge of felony is illegal; as where a person, having charged a man before a magistrate with embezzlement, agrees not to prosecute the charge in consideration of a bill of exchange being accepted by another person. (k)

Where an indictment for compounding felony alleged that the defendant desisted from prosecuting, and it appeared that he did prosecute to conviction, the defendant was held entitled to be acquitted. (l)

It is made felony by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 101, (m) to take any reward for helping a person to any property stolen or obtained by false pretences; and to advertise a reward for the return of things stolen, incurs a forfeiture of fifty pounds by sec. 102 of the same Act.

An agreement to put an end to a prosecution for a misdemeanor has been considered to be illegal, as impeding the course of public justice; (n) but it is sometimes done after conviction, with the sanction of the Court, in cases where the offence principally and more immediately affects an individual; the defendant being permitted to speak with the prosecutor before any judgment is pronounced, and a trivial punishment being inflicted if the prosecutor declares himself satisfied. (o) And where, in a case of an indictment for ill-treating a parish apprentice, a security for the fair expenses of the prosecution had been given by the defendant after conviction, upon an understanding that the Court would abate the period of his imprisonment, the security was held to be good, upon the ground that it was given with the sanction of the Court, and to be considered as part of the punishment suffered by the defendant in expiation of his offence, in addition to the imprisonment inflicted on him. (p)

So where a defendant was prosecuted by parish officers, and convicted for disobeying an order of maintenance, and sentence was deferred by the Court with a view to an arrangement, and in the meantime he was committed to prison, and the officers demanded a sum considerably exceeding the amount of maintenance due, but part of which was to cover costs; the defendant paid part, and gave a note for the remainder, and was then brought into Court, fined 1s. and discharged; it did not appear whether the particulars of the arrangement were made known to the Court, but the defendant made no complaint when brought up; it was held that the compromise was legal. (q)

Distinction in these cases between offences affecting the public and the injured party only.

It has been laid down, that 'the law will permit a compromise of all offences, though made the subject of a criminal prosecution, for which offences the injured party might recover damages in an action.' (r) But it seems that this proposition should be limited to the 'cases where the private rights of the injured party are made the subject of agreement, and where by the previous conviction of the defendant the rights of the public are also preserved inviolate.' (s) For 'when a verdict of guilty is taken, and the Court suspend judgment, and allow the questions between the parties to be referred, the matter is very different, for then it is only to enable the Court the better to see what sentence ought to be given.' (t) 'But if the offence is of a public nature, no agreement can be valid that is founded on the consideration of stifling a prosecution for it.' (u) A contract therefore to withdraw a prosecution for perjury, and to give no evidence against the accused is founded on an illegal consideration and void. (v)

Perjury.

Riot and assault.

So where an action was brought on an agreement, by which the defendants, in consideration that the plaintiff, being the prosecutor of an indictment against certain persons for an assault and riot, would not proceed further on such indictment, promised the plaintiff to pay him a certain sum of money, and in pursuance of that agreement the plaintiff did not proceed further with the indictment, and informed the Court, before which the indictment was pending, of the premises, and, by leave of the Court, forbore to give evidence upon the indictment, and thereupon there was an acquittal; it was held that the agreement was illegal; for the offence was not confined to the personal injury, but was accompanied with a riot, which was a matter of public concern, and therefore not legally the subject of compromise. (w)

Nuisance to a public river.

In one case an indictment for a nuisance by making an embankment in the Thames, whereby the navigation was obstructed, was referred; (x) but the question of the legality of the reference was not raised. And where an indictment had been prepared by the plaintiff for erecting walls or cribs across the Wye, which were a nuisance to the navigation, and the defendant gave the plaintiff a bond to remove the nuisances before a certain time, in order to save expense and prevent the indictment being preferred, the bond was held good. (y) But where an indictment had been preferred against the defendant for nonrepair of a highway, which it was alleged he ought to have repaired ratione tenuræ, and the prosecutor and defendant before the trial agreed to leave the question of liability of repair of the highway to reference, and the arbitrator was to make an award on the evidence adduced before him, and a verdict was to be entered according to the result of the award, and the arbitrator awarded that the defendant was guilty of the non-repair alleged in the indictment; it was held that the reference was illegal, as the question as to the liability to repair was of public concern. (z)

In one case an indictment for conspiracy was referred, (a) but the question of the lawfulness of the reference was not raised; the Court of Queen's Bench has since, however, declined to lay down as law, that such an indictment can be referred. (b)

Conspiracy.

Where, however, indictments, for perjury and conspiracy were removed into the Queen's Bench, and on the indictment for perjury coming on for trial, it was agreed, under the strong advice of counsel, that no evidence should be tendered, a verdict of not guilty taken on both indictments, and that all matters in difference between the prosecutor and defendant should be referred to a barrister; it was held that it would have been illegal to refer the indictment for perjury, and, as it should seem, the indictment for conspiracy; but that the indictments were not referred, and the verdicts of acquittal must at all events stand; and there was nothing illegal in referring all matters in difference and at the same time consenting to verdicts of acquittal, unless there was a corrupt agreement to stifle the prosecution, which in the present case did not appear to be the fact. (c)

Reference after verdict.

In the well considered judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in Keir v. Leeman, (d) it is said, 'it is very remarkable what very little authority is to be found, rather consisting of dicta than decisions, for the principle that any compromise of a misdemeanor, or indeed of any public offence, can be otherwise than illegal, and any promise founded on such a consideration otherwise than void. If the matter were res integra, we should have no doubt on the point. We have no doubt that in all offences which involve damages to an injured party, for which he may maintain an action, (e) it is competent for him, notwithstanding they are also of a public nature, to compromise or settle his private damage in any way he may think fit. It is said, indeed, that in the case of an assault he may also undertake not to prosecute on behalf of the public. It may be so; but we are not disposed to extend this any further.'

It is clear that the consent of the Court cannot make an agreement to abandon a prosecution valid, if it would otherwise be unlawful. (f)

The compounding of informations on penal statutes is a misdemeanor against public justice, by contributing to make the laws odious to the people. (g) Therefore, in order to discourage malicious informers, and to provide that offences, when once discovered, shall be duly prosecuted, it was enacted by the 18 Eliz. c. 5, s. 4, that if any person, 'by colour or pretence of process, or without process upon colour or pretence of any matter of offence against any penal law, make any composition, or take any money, reward, or promise of reward, without the order or consent of some Court, he shall stand two hours in the pillory, (h) be forever disabled to sue on any popular or penal statute, and shall forfeit ten pounds. This severe statute extends even to penal actions, where the whole penalty is given to the prosecutor. (i) But it does not apply to penalties which are only recoverable by information before justices; and an indictment for making a composition in such a case was holden bad, in arrest of judgment. (k)

In a case where it was held that threatening, by letter or otherwise, to put in motion a prosecution by a public officer to recover penalties for selling Fryer's Balsam without a stamp, (l) for the purpose of obtaining money to stay the prosecution (not being such a threat as a firm and prudent man might not be expected to resist), was not in itself an indictable offence at common law, though it was alleged that money was obtained, it seems to have been considered that such an offence would be indictable under the foregoing section of this statute of Elizabeth. (m) But no indictment for any attempt to commit such a statutable misdemeanor can be sustained as a misdemeanor at common law, without at least bringing the offence intended within, and laying it to be against, the statute. Though if the party so threatened had been alleged to be guilty of the offence imputed, within the statute imposing the duty and creating the penalty, such an attempt to compound and stifle a public prosecution for the sake of private lucre, in fraud of the revenue, and against the policy of the statute (which gives the penalty as auxiliary to the revenue, and in furtherance of public justice for the sake of example,) might also, upon general principles, have been deemed a sufficient ground on which to have sustained the indictment at common law. (n)

A party comes within the 18 Eliz. c. 5, although there be no action or proceeding for the penalty.

A party is liable to the punishment prescribed by the 18 Eliz. c. 5, for taking the penalty imposed by a penal statute, though there is no action or proceeding for the penalty. The prisoner applied to one Round, and demanded five pounds, as a penalty which Round had incurred under the General Turnpike Act, by suffering his waggon to be drawn on a turnpike road by more than four horses. Round had incurred such a penalty, and the prisoner obtained the money by way of composition to prevent any legal proceedings; no process had been sued out, and no information had been laid before a magistrate. The prisoner having been convicted, judgment was respite, upon a doubt whether the offence was within the statute, so as to subject the prisoner to the specific punishment therein prescribed, inasmuch as no action or proceeding was depending in which the order or consent of any Court in Westminster Hall for a composition could have been obtained. But

(h) This part of the punishment is abolished by the 56 Geo. 3, c. 138, But sec. 2 empowers the Court to pass such sentence of fine or imprisonment, or of both, in lieu of the sentence of pillory, as to the Court shall seem proper: and see the 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 23. the judges were all of opinion that the conviction was right, and that the statute applies to all cases of taking a penalty incurred, or pretended to be incurred, without leave of a Court at Westminster, or without judgment or conviction. (o)

A person may be convicted under the 18 Eliz. c. 5, s. 4, for taking money upon colour or pretence of a party having committed an offence, though in fact no offence liable to a penalty has been committed by the person from whom the money is taken. One Peverill, who kept a retail beer-shop, but had no license to sell spirits, having given a woman a glass of gin, as a new-year's gift, the prisoner threatened to prosecute him for selling gin without a license, and afterwards obtained money from Peverill, as a reward for forbearing to prosecute him for the supposed offence of selling gin without a license. No information was actually preferred, nor any process sued out. It was objected that, as no offence had been actually committed by Peverill, and as no process had been issued, or information laid against him, the case was not within the statute. The jury having found the prisoner guilty, upon a case reserved, the judges thought that the words, 'upon colour or pretence of any matter of offence,' extended to a case where no penalty had been incurred, and that the conviction was right. CHAPTER THE FOURTEENTH.

OF OFFENCES BY PERSONS IN OFFICE.

Officers indictable for misconduct.

WHERE an officer neglects a duty incumbent on him, either by common law or by statute, he is indictable for his offence; and this, whether he be an officer of the common law, or appointed by Act of Parliament: (a) and a person holding a public office under the King's letters patent, or derivatively from such authority, has been considered as amenable to the law for every part of his conduct, and obnoxious to punishment for not faithfully discharging it. (b) And it is laid down generally, that any public officer is indictable for misbehaviour in his office. (c) There is also the further punishment of the forfeiture of the office for the misdemeanor of doing anything directly contrary to its design. (d) And in the case of a coroner, the 25 Geo. 2, c. 29, s. 6, makes particular provision, and enacts, that when convicted of extortion, or wilful neglect of duty, or misdemeanor in office, he may be removed from office by the judgment of the Court in which he is convicted, unless such office be annual, or annexed to some other office. And by the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116, s. 6, the Lord Chancellor may remove a county coroner for inability or misbehaviour in his office. Where a duty is thrown upon a body of several persons, and they neglect it, each is individually liable to prosecution for the neglect. (e)

It is proposed to treat shortly, in the present chapter, of oppression, negligence, fraud, and extortion, by persons in office; and of the refusal of persons to execute the duties of their offices when properly appointed; leaving the subjects of buying and selling offices, and of bribery, for subsequent chapters.

Oppression by public officers.

The oppression and tyrannical partiality of judges, justices, and other magistrates in the administration, and under colour of their offices, may be punished by impeachment in Parliament, or by information or indictment, according to the rank of the offenders, and the circumstances of the offence. (f) Thus, if a justice of the peace abuses the authority reposed in him by law, in order to gratify his malice, or promote his private interests or ambition, he may be punished by indictment or information. But the Court of King's Bench have expressly declared, that though a justice of peace should act illegally, yet if he has acted honestly and candidly, without oppression, malice, revenge, or any bad view or ill-intention whatsoever, the Court will never punish him by the extraordinary course of an information, but will leave the party complaining to the ordinary method of prosecution by action or indictment (g). And whenever justices have been challenged, either by way of indictment, or application for a criminal information, the question has always been, not whether the act done might, upon full and mature investigation, be found strictly right, but from what motive it had proceeded; whether from a dishonest, oppressive, or corrupt motive, under which description fear and favour may generally be included, or from mistake or error. In the former case, alone, they have become the objects of punishment. (h) But where two sets of magistrates, having a concurrent jurisdiction, one set of them appointed a meeting to grant ale licenses, and, after such appointment, the other set of magistrates appointed a meeting for the same purpose on a subsequent day, and having met, granted a license which had been refused by the first set; it was held that the proceedings of the magistrates appointing the second meeting were illegal, and the subject of an indictment. Lord Kenyon, C. J., said that it was proper the question should be settled whether it were legal for two different sets of magistrates, having a concurrent jurisdiction, to run a race in the exercise of any part of their jurisdiction; and that it was of infinite importance to the public that the acts of magistrates should not only be substantially good, but also that they should be decorous. And Ashhurst, J., said that it was a breach of the law to attempt to wrest the jurisdiction out of the hands of the magistrates who first gave notice of the meeting; for what the law says shall not be done, it becomes illegal to do, and is therefore the subject matter of an indictment, without the addition of any corrupt motives. (i) So, if a magistrate were wilfully, and in defiance of the known law, to refuse bail in a case where the defendant was entitled to be bailed, he would be liable to a criminal information or indictment. (k)

The conduct of justices of the peace in granting or refusing licenses to sell ale has been frequently the subject of investigation; and it seems to be clear that though upon this matter the justices have a discretionary jurisdiction given them by the law, and though discretion means the exercising the best of their judgment upon the occasion that calls for it, yet if this discretion be wilfully abused, it is criminal, and under the control of the Court of King's Bench. (l) That Court will, therefore, grant an information against justices who refuse, from corrupt and improper motives, to grant such licenses; (m) and an information will be granted against them as well for granting a license improperly as for refusing one in the same manner. (u)

forcing persons to give evidence.

To prevent abuses by the extensive power which the law is obliged to repose in gaolers, the 14 Edw. 3, c. 10, enacts, that if any gaoler, by too great duress of imprisonment, makes any prisoner that he hath in ward become an approver or an appellor against his will; that is, to accuse and turn evidence against some other person; it shall be felony in the gaoler. For it is not lawful to induce or excite any man even to a just accusation of another; much less to do it by duress of imprisonment; and least of all by a gaoler to whom the prisoner is committed for safe custody. (o) And a gaoler may be discharged and fined for voluntarily suffering his prisoners to escape, or for barbarously misusing them. (p) So, a gaoler is indictable for refusing to receive a prisoner under the commitment of a magistrate. (q)

the poor are punishable for misfeasance in their offices.

An overseer of the poor is also indictable for misfeasance in the execution of his office: as if he relieve the poor where there is no necessity for it; (r) or if he misuse the poor, as by keeping and lodging several poor persons in a filthy unwholesome room, with the windows not in a sufficient state of repair to protect them against the severity of the weather; (s) or by exacting labour from them when they are unable to work. (t) And if overseers conspire to prevail upon a man to marry a poor woman big with child, for the purpose of throwing the expense of maintaining her and the issue from themselves upon another parish or township, they may be indicted. (u) And for most breaches of their duty overseers may be punished by indictment or information; (v) but with respect to the proceeding by information, as it is an extraordinary remedy, the Court of King's Bench will not suffer it to be applied to the punishment of ordinary offences, and has long come to a resolution not to grant informations against overseers for procuring a pauper's marriage with a view to burden another parish. (w)

An indictment against overseers on the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 47, for not accounting to the auditor of a union, upon request, on a day appointed by him, is bad, unless it appear that there was some rule, order, or regulation of the poor-law commissioners that the overseers should account upon such request; and where no such order, &c., is alleged, the indictment cannot be sustained after verdict, merely because it appears, by inference, or by the inducement, that the defendants have not in fact accounted for one whole quarter. (x) Upon such an indictment it is sufficient, at least after verdict, to allege the order to have been made by 'the poor-law commissioners for England and Wales,' without naming each commissioner, and to state that a copy of the order, under seal, &c., was 'duly sent' to the overseers, without alleging actual service on them. (y)

An overseer of the poor is not indictable if (without fraud or menace) he remove a pauper under an order of removal after it has been confirmed on appeal by the sessions, subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench, and before its final determination by that Court. (z)

It has been already stated, that an officer neglecting the duties of his office is guilty of an indictable offence. (a) In some cases also the offence will amount to a forfeiture of his office, if it be a beneficial one; (b) for, by the implied condition that the grantee of an office shall execute it diligently and faithfully, it appears to be clear that he will be liable to a forfeiture of it, not only for doing a thing directly contrary to its design, but also for neglecting to attend to his duty at all usual, proper, and convenient times and places, whereby any damage shall accrue to those by or for whom he was made an officer. (c) A coroner neglecting the duties of his office is indictable: (d) and by the 3 Edw. 1, c. 9, the sheriff, coroner, or any other bailiff concealing felonies, or not arresting felons, or otherwise not doing their duty, are to be imprisoned for a year, and fined at the King's pleasure. (e) A sheriff is indictable for refusing or neglecting to execute a criminal according to his sentence; but he is not bound to execute a criminal if he be not in his custody, and in such case, if it is intended by the Court which passed the sentence that the sheriff should do execution, there should be a special mandate to the party having the prisoner in custody to deliver him to the sheriff, and another to the sheriff to receive the prisoner and execute him. (f) And an indictment lies at common law against all subordinate officers for neglect, as well as misconduct, in the discharge of their official duties. A constable is therefore indictable for neglecting the duties required of him by common law or by statute; (g) and when a statute requires him to do what without requiring had been his duty, it is not imposing a new duty, and he is indictable at common law for the neglect. (h) And an overseer of the poor is indictable for the wilful neglect of his duty. Thus overseers have been held to be indictable for not providing for the poor; (i) for refusing to account within four days after the appointment of new overseers, under the 43 Eliz. c. 2; (k) for not making a rate to reimburse constables under the 14 Car. 2, c. 14; (l) and for not receiving a pauper sent to them by order of two justices; (m) or disobeying any other order of justices, where the justices have competent jurisdiction. (n)

Overseers of the poor punishable for neglecting to relieve

It was the opinion of a majority of the learned judges present at the discussion, that an indictment would not lie against an overseer for not relieving a pauper, unless there were an order for his relief, except in a case of immediate emergency, where there was not time to get an order. (o) But there may be cases in which the neglect to provide a pauper with necessaries will render an overseer liable to be indicted. Thus where an indictment stated that the defendant, an overseer, had under his care a poor person belonging to his township, but neglected and refused to provide for her necessary meat, &c., whereby she was reduced to a state of extreme weakness, and afterwards, through want of such reasonable and necessary meat, &c., died, the defendant was convicted, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment. (p) And where an overseer was indicted for neglecting to supply medical assistance when required, to a pauper labouring under dangerous illness, the learned judge before whom the indictment was tried held that an offence was sufficiently charged and proved, though such pauper was not in the parish workhouse, nor had previously to his illness received or stood in need of parish relief. B., Grose, J., Thomson, B., Lawrence, J., Le Blanc, J., and Chambre, J., thought otherwise, and were of opinion, that except in a case of immediate and urgent necessity, the overseer was only bound to act under an order of justices, in a case where such an order could be had.

Act, or to receive the vote of any rate-payer as aforesaid, or shall in any manner whatsoever alter, falsify, conceal, or suppress any vote or votes as aforesaid, such churchwarden, rate-collector, overseer, or other parish officer, shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

It has been doubted whether a clergyman who refuses to marry a couple is indictable for such refusal; and where an indictment against a clergyman for refusing to marry a couple alleged that the parties required the clergyman to solemnise a marriage between them on or before the 14th day of August then next, and that he unlawfully refused and neglected so to do, and the evidence was that on the 2nd of August, at nine P.M., the parties desired him to fix a time for the marriage before the 14th of August, and he said, 'I'll marry him, when he has expressed a desire to be confirmed;' and no other application was made; it was held that the tender was insufficient; for it ought to have been made at a time when the ceremony could have been lawfully performed, and therefore the evidence did not sustain the averment of a refusal. (r)

Clergyman refusing to marry a couple.

Upon an indictment against an officer for neglect of duty, it is sufficient to state that he was such officer, and it is not necessary to state his appointment. (s) And in the case of a delinquent in India, prosecuted under the 24 Geo. 3, c. 25, for neglect of duty, it was held not to be necessary to state that the neglect was corrupt; the statute making it a misdemeanor if it was wilful. (t) And the indictment for neglect of duty need not aver that the defendant had notice of all the facts it states, if it was his duty to have known them. (u) Where some of the charges against the defendant were for disobeying orders, and it was stated that those orders were made and communicated to him, but their continuance in force was not averred, such an averment was insisted upon as essential; but the Court said that the orders must be taken to continue in force until they were revoked; and the objection was overruled. (v) Other charges in the same case against the defendant were for not acting upon particular events, within the settlement, as those events made it his duty to act: but it was not averred that he had notice of those events. The Court, however, held that an allegation of notice was not necessary; for as the events happened within a foreign settlement, whilst the defendant was one of the council in such settlement, he was bound to take notice of them. (w)

By the 33 Geo. 3, c. 55, two justices at a petty or special sessions of the peace, upon complaint on oath of any neglect of duty or disobedience of any warrant or order of any justice of the peace, by any constable, overseer of the poor, or other peace or parish officer, such constable, overseer, or other officer, having been duly summoned, may impose, upon conviction, any reasonable

The indictment seemed open to several objections, it did not aver that the parties might lawfully marry; or that the clergyman was required to perform the ceremony at a lawful time, between the appointed hours. Strong intimations were thrown out that a refusal fine or fines not exceeding the sum of forty shillings, as a punishment for such neglect of duty or disobedience.

Chief officers of corporations absents themselves from, or hindering the elections of other officers, may be imprisoned.

The absence or misconduct of the chief officers of corporations at the time of elections, whereby the completion of the election of other chief officers may be prevented, is punishable by the 11 Geo. 1, c. 4, s. 6, which enacts, 'that if any mayor, bailiff or bailiffs, or other chief officer or officers of any city, borough, or town corporate, shall voluntarily absent himself or themselves from, or knowingly and designedly prevent or hinder the election of any other mayor, bailiff, or other chief officer in the same city, borough, or town corporate, upon the day, or within the time appointed by charter or ancient usage for such election;' such offender being convicted shall, for every offence, be imprisoned for six months, and be for ever disabled from exercising any office belonging to the same city, borough, or corporation. This voluntary absence from the election of a chief officer must be such an absence whereby the mischief complained of in the preamble of the statute, namely, the preventing the completion of the election of a chief officer, may possibly be occasioned. It has been decided, therefore, that a chief officer voluntarily absents himself upon the charter day of election of his successor is not indictable, unless his presence as such chief officer be necessary by the constitution of the corporation to constitute a legal corporate assembly for such purpose. (x)

Officers and clerks in Chancery liable to penalties for taking gratuities.

By the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 94, s. 41, 'if any master in ordinary of the high court of Chancery, or any person holding any office, situation, or employment in any office of the said Court, or under any of the judges or officers thereof, shall, for anything done or pretended to be done relating to his office, situation, or employment, or under colour of doing anything relating to his office, situation, or employment, wilfully take, demand, receive, or accept, or appoint or allow any person whatsoever to take for him or on his account, or for or on account of any person by him named, or in trust for him, or for any other person by him named, any fee, gift, gratuity, or emolument, or anything of value, other than what is allowed or directed to be taken by him as aforesaid, the person so offending, when duly convicted, shall forfeit and pay the sum of £500, and shall be removed from any office, situation, or employment he may hold in the said Court, and shall be rendered, and is hereby rendered, incapable for ever thereafter of holding any office, situation, or employment in the said Court, or otherwise serving his Majesty, his heirs, or successors.'

How offenders may be prosecuted.

By sec. 42, 'any such offender may be prosecuted either by information at the suit of his Majesty's Attorney-General, or by criminal information before his Majesty's Court of King's Bench, or by indictment.'

Chief and junior clerks subject to the penalties in the preceding Act.

By the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, masters in ordinary in the Court of Chancery are abolished, and certain duties imposed upon the chief and junior clerks of the Master of the Rolls and Vice-Chancellors; and by sec. 24, 'Every chief clerk and every junior clerk' appointed under the Act 'shall be subject and liable to such and the same prohibitions, prosecutions, penalties and punishments,' as are by the preceding Act 'imposed and directed with respect to persons holding any office, situation, or employment in the said Court of Chancery, or under any of the judges or officers thereof, in the same manner as if the enactments therein contained relating to such officers of the said Court respectively were here repeated.' And by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 134, s. 2, the provisions contained in the preceding section are applied to junior clerks appointed under that Act.

Public officers may also be indicted for frauds committed in their official capacities. Thus where two persons were indicted for enabling others to pass their accounts with the pay office in such a way as to enable them to defraud the government, though it was objected that it was only a private matter of account and not indictable, the Court held otherwise, as it related to the public revenue. (xx) And if an overseer of the poor receive from the putative father of a bastard child born within the parish a sum of money as a composition with the parish for the maintenance of the child, he is liable to an indictment for fraudulently omitting to give credit for this sum in his accounts with the parish. (y) It was objected in this case, that the defendant was not bound to bring this sum to account, the contract being illegal; (z) that the whole might have been recovered back, and that the defendant himself would have been personally answerable for it to the putative father; that the money, therefore, was not the money of the parish, and that the parish was neither defrauded nor damaged by its being omitted in the overseer's accounts. But Lord Ellenborough was of opinion, that though the defendant would have been liable to the putative father for so much of the money as was not expended upon the maintenance of the child and the lying-in of the mother, yet having taken the money as overseer for the benefit of the parish, he was bound to bring it to account, and that he was guilty of an indictable offence by attempting to put it into his own pocket.

public officers.

So a superintendent of the county constabulary force is indictable for rendering false accounts of the monies received by the constables and by them accounted for to him, it being his duty to render such accounts to the chief constable as a means for ascertaining the sum to be paid to himself for the pay of the constables. (a) So a clerk to the justices of the peace who impose a penalty under the Alehouse Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), is indictable for wilfully neglecting and refusing to pay a moiety of such penalty to the treasurer of the county according to the provisions of that Act. (b)

The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 26, s. 24, makes the officers or servants of Millbank prison liable to certain punishments on conviction before a justice of the peace for furnishing convicts with prohibited articles.

It may be observed, that where a duty is thrown on a body consisting of several persons, each is individually liable for a breach of duty, as well for acts of commission as for omission; and where a public officer is charged with a breach of duty, which duty arises from certain acts within the limits of his office, it is not necessary to state that he had notice of those acts, for he is presumed from his situation to know them. (c)

public officers.

Extortion in a large sense signifies any oppression under colour of right: but in a more strict sense signifies the unlawful taking by any officer, by colour of his office, of any money or thing of value that is not due to him, or more than is due, or before it is due. (d) By the statute of Westm. (3 Edw. 1.) c. 26, which is only in affirmance of the common law, it is declared and enacted to be extortion for any sheriff or other minister of the King, whose office any way concerns the administration or execution of justice, or the common good of the subject, to take any reward whatsoever, except what he received from the King. This statute extends to escheators, coroners, bailiffs, gaolers, and other inferior officers of the King, whose offices were instituted before the making of the Act. (e) Justices of the peace, whose office was instituted after the Act, are bound by their oath of office to take nothing for their office of justice of the peace to be done, but of the King, and fees accustomed, and costs limited by statute. And generally no public officer may take any other fees or rewards for doing anything relating to his office than some statute in force gives him, or such as have been anciently and accustomedly taken; and if he do otherwise, he is guilty of extortion. (f) And it should be observed, that all prescriptions which have been contrary to the statute and to the common law, in affirmance of which it was made, have been always holden to be void; as where the clerk of the market claimed certain fees as due time out of mind for the examination of weights and measures; this was adjudged to be void. (g)

The stated fees of courts of justice may be insisted upon.

But the stated and known fees allowed by the courts of justice to their respective officers, for their labour and trouble, are not restrained by the common law, or by the statute of Westm. 1, c. 26, and therefore such fees may be legally demanded and insisted upon without any danger of extortion. (h) And it seems that an officer who takes a reward, which is voluntarily given to him, and which has been usual in certain cases, for the more diligent or expeditious performance of his duty, cannot be said to be guilty of extortion; for without such a premium it would be impossible in many cases to have the laws executed with vigour and success. (i) But it has been always holden, that a promise to pay an officer money for the doing of a thing which the law will not suffer him to take anything for is merely void, however freely and voluntarily it may appear to have been made. (k)

It has been held to be extortion to oblige the executor of a will to prove it in the bishop's court, and to take fees thereon, when the defendants knew that it had been proved before in the Prerogative Court. (l) And it is extortion in a churchwarden to obtain a silver cup or other valuable thing, by colour of his office. (m) And a coroner is guilty of this offence, who refuses to take the view of a dead body until his fees are paid. (n) So if an under-sheriff obtain his fees by refusing to execute process till they are paid, (o) or take a bond for his fee before execution is sued out, (p) it will be extortion. And it will be the same offence in a sheriff's officer to bargain for money to be paid him by A. to accept A. and B. as bail for C., whom he has arrested; (q) or to arrest a man in order to obtain a release from him; (r) and also in a gaoler to obtain money from his prisoner by colour of his office. (s) In the case of a miller, where the custom has ascertained the toll, if the miller takes more than the custom warrants, it is extortion; (t) and the same if a ferryman takes more than is due by custom for the use of his ferry. (u) And it was held that if the farmer of a market erects so many stalls, as not to leave sufficient room for the market people to stand and sell their wares, so that for want of room they are forced to hire the stalls of the farmer, the taking money for the use of the stalls in such a case is extortion. (v) Where a collector of post-horse duty demanded a sum of money of a person, charging him with having let out post-horses without paying the duty, and threatened him with an Exchequer process, and he thereon gave him a promissory note for five pounds, which was afterwards paid and the proceeds handed over to the farmer of the post-horse duties, it was held to be extortion. (w)

The question of exemption from toll could not be tried on an indictment against a turnpike-keeper for extortion in taking the toll; the general right to demand toll not having been denied, nor the ground of exemption notified, at the time when the toll was taken. (x) And now, by the 4 Geo. 4, c. 95, s. 50, no person, who shall take more toll than he is authorised to take, shall be prosecuted by indictment for extortion, or otherwise.

Turnpike tolls.

The 33 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 62, enacts, that the demanding or receiving any sum of money, or other valuable thing, as a gift or present, or under colour thereof, whether it be for the use of the party receiving the same, or for or pretended to be for the use of the East India Company, or of any other person whatsoever, by any British subject holding or exercising any office or employment under his Majesty, or the Company in the East Indies, shall be deemed to be extortion and a misdemeanor at law, and punished as such. The offender is also to forfeit to the King the present so received, or its full value; but the Court may order such present to be restored to the party who gave it, or may order it, or any part of it, or of any fine which they shall set upon the offender, to be paid to the prosecutor or informer.

An information filed by the Attorney-General charged that the defendant, a British subject, held for a long time an office in the East Indies under the East India Company, viz., the office of resident at Tanjore, and during all that time resided in the East Indies, and that whilst he held the said office, and within six years before the filing of the information, in the East Indies he did unlawfully receive from a certain person in the East Indies a sum of money, viz., 2,000 rupees, of the value of £200 of lawful money of Great Britain, as a gift and present, against the statute; whereby he was guilty of extortion and a misdemeanor, and by force of the statute had forfeited the sum of £200, the value of the said rupees; and the Court of Queen's Bench held that it was no ground to arrest the judgment that the count did not state whether the rupees were Bombay, Madras, or Sicca rupees, or state the value of a single rupee; and that Court and the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the count was good, although it did not aver that the gift was received extorsively or under colour of the office: first, because, supposing the statute were confined to such cases, the information was good after verdict by the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 21, as it described the offence in the words of the statute creating it; and secondly, because the 33 Geo. 3, c. 52, extended to any receipt of a gift by any officer; for the object of the Legislature was to prevent any officer from receiving any gift or present of money in the East Indies absolutely, whatever the reason of the gift might be; and, although the count did not allege for whose use or pretended use the gift was received; for even if an officer received a present under colour of its being a present to the Queen, he would be guilty of an offence within the statute. (y)

Two persons may be indicted jointly for extortion where no fee was due; and there are no accessories in this offence. Upon an

(y) Reg. v. Douglas, 13 Q. B. 42. The jury had found a verdict on several counts, charging receipts of sums in rupees as gifts, after which followed a finding as to each count severally that the sum received, as in the count mentioned, was the sum of so many rupees, which sum of rupees, at the time of receiving them, was of the value of so much British money, being at the rate of 1s. 11d. per rupee; and the Court of Queen's Bench adjudged fine and imprisonment separately upon each count upon which the defendant was convicted; and further, that the defendant, in pursuance of the statute, do also forfeit to the Queen the several sums following (naming the values of the sums in rupees, as found on each count respectively), the said forfeitures amounting together to the sum of (the aggregate of the values); and further, that the defendant be imprisoned until he shall have paid the said fines and forfeitures. And the Court of Exchequer Chamber held, 1st, that this judgment was good, although it did not give the defendant the option of forfeiting the gifts actually received, as the gift itself was money; 2ndly, that it was right to estimate the value at the time of the receipt, and not of the conviction; 3rdly, that imprisonment in default of paying the forfeiture was rightly awarded, as that forfeiture was not arbitrarily imposed by the Court, but fixed by the statute, and superadded, by authority of the statute, to the other punishments of the offence. The Court of Queen's Bench held that the alterations in the Madras Courts made by several statutes did not preclude the issuing of a mandamus under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 63, s. 40, to examine witnesses, to the Madras Court as finally constituted, and that such a mandamus directed to the Chief Justice and other judges, who were two, of the Madras Supreme Court, requiring them to hold a Court and examine witnesses, was well executed by the Chief Justice and one other judge. See also this case as to what parchment writings are such examinations as are required by the Act to be returned to such a mandamus.

indictment against the chancellor and the registrar of a bishop, it was objected that the offices of the defendants were distinct, that what might be extortion in one might not be so in the other, and that therefore the indictment ought not to be joint. But by Parker, C. J., this would be an exception if they were indicted for taking more than they ought; but it is only against them for contriving to get money where none is due: and this is an entire charge. For there are no accessories in extortion: but he that is assisting is as guilty as the extortioner, as he that is party to a riot is answerable for the act of others. (z) And an indictment against three averring that they, colore officiorum suorum, took so much, is good, for they might take so much in gross, and afterwards divide it amongst them, of which the party grieved could have no notice. (a)

for extortion, and there are no accessories in extortion.

It is said, that an indictment for extortion may be laid in any county by the 31 Eliz. c. 5, s. 4; (b) but this position has been questioned. (c) It may be tried and determined by justices of the peace at their sessions by virtue of the term 'extortions' in their commission. (d) A count for extortion ought to charge a single offence only; because every extortion from every particular person is a separate and distinct offence, and each offence requires a separate and distinct punishment, and therefore a count charging the defendant with extorting divers sums exceeding the ancient rate for ferrying men and cattle over a river is bad. (e) The indictment must state a sum which the defendant received: but it is not material to prove the exact sum as laid in the indictment; so that if a man be indicted for taking extorsively twenty shillings, and there be proof but of one shilling, it will be sufficient. (f)

Trial.

Indictment.

An indictment for extortion, where nothing was due, ought to state that nothing was due; (g) and if it be for taking more than was due, it ought to show how much was due. (h) And the extorsive agreement is not the offence, but the taking; for a pardon after the agreement, and before the taking, does not pardon the extortion. (i)

Not material to prove the exact sum laid.

The offence of extortion is punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment; and also by a removal from the office in the execution of which it was committed; (k) and there is a further additional punishment by the statute of Westm. 1, c. 26, by which it is enacted, 'that no sheriff nor other King's officer shall take any reward to do his office, but shall be paid of that which they take of the King; and that he who so doth shall yield twice as much,

Refusal to execute offices.

It is an offence at common law to refuse to serve an office when duly elected. (n) And the refusal of persons to execute ministerial offices to which they are duly appointed, and from the execution of which they have no proper ground of exemption, seems in general to be punishable by indictment.

Constables.

Thus it has been held to be indictable for a constable, after he has been duly chosen, to refuse to execute the office, (o) or to refuse to take the oath for that purpose. (p) But a person is not liable to serve the office of constable unless he be resident in a parish. Where, therefore, a person occupied a house and paid all parish rates in respect of it, and carried on the trade of a printer, frequenting the house daily on all working days, and sometimes remaining there during the night at work, but not sleeping in the house, it was held that he was not liable to serve the office of constable in the parish where the house was situated. (q) But where a person occupied a warehouse in M., and usually slept at a lodging-house in M. from Monday till Saturday, when he returned to his mother's in H., where he also had premises, and he did suit and service to the court-leet of H., the Court thought that he was liable to be appointed a constable of M. (r)

It is sufficient, in an indictment for refusing to execute the office of constable, to state that the defendant unlawfully, &c., 'did neglect and refuse to take upon himself the execution of the said office;' and it is not necessary to state that he refused to be sworn. (s) Upon such an indictment, proof that he refused to be sworn is sufficient prima facie evidence of a refusal to take the office; but if it were proved that, although not sworn, he had acted as constable, the refusal to take the oath would not prove that he refused to take the office. (s)

Where there is a special custom of swearing-in constables, as in the City of London, it is unnecessary to set such custom out in the indictment. (s)

Overseers of the poor.

The 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 41, which authorizes justices in cases of tumult, riot, &c., to appoint special constables, enacts, by secs. 7 & 8, that any person appointed and neglecting to take the oath, and act, shall be liable to certain penalties. (t) So a person is indictable for refusing to take upon himself the office of overseer of the poor. (u) For though the 43 Eliz. c. 2 says only that certain persons therein described shall be overseers, and gives no express indictment for a refusal of the office, yet upon the principles of common law, which are that every man shall be indicted for disobeying a statute, the refusal to serve when duly appointed is indictable. (v) But there should be previous notice of the appointment, and the indictment should show that the defendant was bound to undertake the office by setting forth how he was elected. (w) And if an indictment for refusing to serve the office of constable on being thereto chosen by a corporation do not set forth the prescription of the corporation so to choose, it is bad; for a corporation has no power of common right to choose a constable. CHAPTER THE FIFTEENTH.

OF BUYING AND SELLING OFFICES.

[147] CONCERNING the sale of offices of a public nature, it has been well observed, that nothing can be more palpably prejudicial to the good of the public, than to have places of the highest concernment, on the due execution whereof the happiness of both king and people depends, disposed of, not to those who are most able to execute them, but to those who are most able to pay for them; nor can anything be a greater discouragement to industry and virtue than to see those places of trust and honour, which ought to be the rewards of persons who by their industry and diligence have qualified themselves for them, conferred on those who have no other recommendation than that of being the highest bidders; neither can anything be a greater temptation to officers to abuse their power by bribery and extortion, and other acts of injustice, than the consideration of having been at a great expense in gaining their places, and the necessity of sometimes straining a point to make their bargain answer their expectations. (a)

common law.

The buying and selling such offices has therefore been considered an offence malum in se, and indictable at common law. (b) In a case of an indictment for a conspiracy to obtain money, by procuring from the lords of the Treasury the appointment of a person to an office in the customs, it was proposed to argue that the indictment was bad on the face of it, as it was not a misdemeanor at common law to sell or to purchase an office like that of coast-waiter. But Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said that if that were to be made a question, it must be debated on a motion in arrest of judgment, or on a writ of error: but that, after reading the case of Rex v. Vaughan, (c) it would be very difficult to argue that the offence charged in the indictment was not a misdemeanor. And Grose, J., afterwards, in passing sentence, said that there could be no doubt but that the offence charged was clearly a misdemeanor at common law. (d)

bribe a minister to give an office.

The case of Rex v. Vaughan, was an attempt only to bribe a cabinet minister and a member of the Privy Council to give the defendant an office in the colonies. (e) And where the defendant, who was clerk to the agent for the French prisoners of war at Porchester Castle, took bribes in order to procure the exchange of some of them out of their turn, it appears to have been made the subject of an indictment. (f) Rex v. Beale, cited in Rex v. Gibbs, 1 East, R. 183.

But it has been endeavoured to prevent the mischiefs of buying and selling offices, by several statutes.

The 12 Rich. 2, c. 2, enacted, 'that the chancellor, treasurer, keeper of the privy seal, steward of the King's house, the King's chamberlain, clerk of the rolls, the justices of the one bench and of the other, barons of the Exchequer, and all other that shall be called to ordain, name, or make, justices of the peace, sheriffs, escheators, customers, comptrollers, or any other officer or minister of the King, shall be firmly sworn that they shall not ordain, name, or make, any of the above-mentioned officers for any gift or brokerage, favour or affection; nor that none which pursueth by himself, or by other, privily or openly, to be in any manner of office, shall be put into the same office, or in any other, but that they make all such officers and ministers of the best and most lawful men, and sufficient to their estimation and knowledge.' (g)

The 4 Hen. 4, c. 5, ordained 'that no sheriff shall let his bailiwick to farm to any man for the time that he occupieth such office.'

But a principal statute relating to this subject is the 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 16, (h) which, for the avoiding corruption which might thereafter happen in the officers, in places wherein there is requisite to be had the true administration of justice or services of trust, and to the intent that persons worthy and meet to be advanced should thereafter be preferred, enacts, that if any person bargain or sell any office, or deputation of office, or take any money or profit directly or indirectly, or any promise, &c., bond, or any assurance to receive any money, &c., for any office or deputation of office, or to the intent that any person should have, exercise, or enjoy, any office, or the deputation of any office, which office, or any part or parcel thereof, shall in anywise concern the administration or execution of justice, or the receipt, controlment, or payment of the King's treasure, rent, revenue, &c., or any the King's customs, or the keeping the King's towns, castles, &c., used for defence, or which shall concern any clerkship in any court of record where justice is ministered; the offender shall not only forfeit all his right to such office or deputation of office, but also shall be adjudged a person disabled to have, occupy, or enjoy such office or deputation. The statute further enacts, that such bargains, sales, bonds, agreements, &c., shall be void; (i) and provides that the Act shall not extend to any office whereof any person shall be seised of any estate of inheritance, nor to any office of the keeping of any park, house, manor, garden, chase, or forest. (k) It provides also that all judgments given or things done by offenders, after the offence and before the offender shall be removed from the exercise of the office or deputation, shall be good and sufficient in law. And further, that the Act shall not extend to be prejudicial or hurtful to any of the chief justices of the King's Bench or Common Pleas, or to any of the justices of assize; but that they may do concerning any offices to be granted by them as they might have done before the making of this Act. (l)

It has been held that the offices of chancellor, registrar, and commissary in ecclesiastical courts, are within the meaning of this statute; (m) also the place of cofferer, (n) and that of surveyor of the customs; (o) and the place of customer of a port; (p) and the offices of collector and supervisor of the excise; (q) and in a writ of error on a judgment in Ireland it was held clearly that the offices of clerk of the crown, and clerk of the peace, were within the statute. (r) But offices in fee have been held to be out of the statute; (s) and the sale of a bailiwick of a hundred is not within it, for such an office does not concern the administration of justice, nor is it an office of trust. (t) And for the like reason the office of clerk to the deputy registrar in the prerogative Court of Canterbury is not within the Act. (u) It has also been adjudged that a seat in the six clerks' office is not within the statute, being a ministerial office only; (v) and it was held that it did not extend to military officers, (w) nor to the purser of a ship, (x) but this last decision was doubted; (y) and in a later case it was said by Lord Mansfield, that if the Lords of the Admiralty were to take money for their warrant to appoint a person to be a purser, it would be criminal in the corrupter and corrupted. (z) It was decided also that this statute did not extend to the plantations. (a) But with respect to military and naval commissions, and the different places in the public departments of government, the colonies or plantations, or in the appointment of the East India Company, alterations have been made by a recent statute, which will be presently mentioned.

An offender against this Act can never hold the office.

One who makes a contract for an office contrary to the purport of this statute, is so far disabled to hold the same, that he cannot at any time during his life be restored to a capacity of holding it by any grant or dispensation whatever. (b)

(l) Sec. 5. The 6 Geo. 4, c. 89, authorised the purchase of the office of receiver and comptroller of the seal of the Court of King's Bench and Common Pleas, and of the custos brevium of the Court of Common Pleas by the commissioners of the Treasury, for certain annuities; and after the confirmation of the agreement by Parliament the rights and interests of all persons claiming or entitled to claim under the letters patent mentioned in the Act, are to cease and determine.

With regard to the deputation of an office, it is held that where an office is within the statute, and the salary is certain, if the principal make a deputation reserving a less sum out of the salary, it is good: so, if the profits be uncertain, arising from fees, if the principal make a deputation, reserving a certain sum out of the fees and profits of the office, it is good: for in these cases the deputy is not to pay unless the profits arise to so much; and though a deputy by his constitution is in place of his principal, yet he has no right to his fees, they still continuing to be the principal's; so that, as to him, it is only reserving a part of his own, and giving away the rest to another. But where the reservation or agreement is not to pay out of the profits, but to pay generally a certain sum, it must be paid at all events; and a bond for performance of such agreement is void by the statute. (c)

But this statute has been much extended by the 49 Geo. 3, c. 126, which, after reciting it, enacts, 'that all the provisions therein contained shall extend to Scotland and Ireland, and to all offices in the gift of the crown, or of any office appointed by the crown; and all commissions, civil, naval, or military; and to all places and employments, and to all deputations to any such offices, commissions, places, or employments, in the respective departments or offices, or under the appointment or superintendence and control of the lord high treasurer, or commissioners of the Treasury, the secretary of state, the lords commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral, the master-general and principal officers of his Majesty's ordnance, the commander-in-chief, the secretary at war, the paymaster-general of his Majesty's forces, the commissioners for the affairs of India, the commissioners of the excise, the treasurer of the navy, the commissioners of the navy, the commissioners for victualling, the commissioners of transports, the commissary-general, the store-keeper-general, and also the principal officers of any other public department or office of his Majesty's government in any part of the United Kingdom, or in any of his Majesty's dominions, colonies, or plantations, which now belong or may hereafter belong to his Majesty; and also to all offices, commissions, places, and employments belonging to or under the appointment or control of the East India Company, (d) in as full and ample a manner as if the provisions of the said Act were repeated, and made part of this Act: and the said Act and this Act shall be construed as one Act, as if the same had been herein repeated and re-enacted.'

Sec. 3. 'If any person or persons shall sell, or bargain for the sale of, or receive, have, or take any money, fee, gratuity, loan of money, reward, or profit, directly or indirectly, or any promise, agreement, covenant, contract, bond or assurance; or shall by any way, device, or means, contract or agree to receive or have any money, fee, gratuity, loan of money, reward, or Persons receiving or paying money for soliciting or obtaining offices, and any negotiations or pretended negotiations relating thereto, guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sec. 4. 'If any person or persons shall receive, have, or take, any money, fee, reward, or profit, directly, or indirectly, or take any promise, agreement, covenant, contract, bond, or assurance, or by any way, means, or device, contract or agree to receive or have any money, fee, gratuity, loan of money, reward or profit, directly or indirectly, for any interest, solicitation, petition, request, recommendation, or negotiation whatever, made or to be made, or pretended to be made, or under any pretence of making, or causing or procuring to be made, any interest, solicitation, petition, request, recommendation, or negotiation, in or about or in anywise touching, concerning, or relating to, any nomination, appointment, or deputation to, or resignation of, any such office, commission, place, or employment, as aforesaid, or under any pretence for using or having used any interest, solicitation, petition, request, recommendation, or negotiation, in or about any such nomination, appointment, deputation, or resignation, or for the obtaining or having obtained the consent or consents, or voice or voices, of any person or persons as aforesaid to such nomination, appointment, deputation, or resignation; and also if any person or persons shall give or pay, or cause or procure to be given or paid, any money, fee, gratuity, loan of money, reward or profit, or make, or cause, or procure to be made, any promise, agreement, covenant, contract, bond, or assurance, or by any way, means, or device, contract or agree, or give or pay, or cause or procure to be given or paid, any money, fee, gratuity, loan of money, reward, or profit, for any solicitation, petition, request, recommendation, or negotiation whatever, made or to be made, that shall in anywise touch, concern, or relate to any nomination, appointment, or deputation to, or resignation of, any such office, commission, place, or employment as aforesaid, or for the obtaining or having obtained, directly or indirectly, the consent or consents, or voice or voices, of any person or persons as aforesaid, to any such nomination, appointment, deputation, or resignation; and also if any person or persons shall, for or in expectation of gain, fee, gratuity, loan of money, reward, or profit, solicit, recommend, or negotiate, in any manner, for any person or persons, in any matter that shall in anywise touch, concern, or relate to, any such nomination, appointment, deputation, or resignation aforesaid, or for the obtaining, directly or indirectly, the consent or consents, or voice or voices, of any person or persons to any such nomination, appointment, or deputation, or resignation aforesaid, then and in every such case every such person, and also every person who shall wilfully and knowingly aid, abet, or assist, such person therein, shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor.⁷

Sec. 5. If any person shall open or keep any house or place for the soliciting or negotiating any business relating to vacancies in offices, &c., in or under any public department, or to the sale or purchase of such offices, or appointment to them, or resignation, transfer, or exchange of them, such offender, and every person aiding or assisting therein, is guilty of a misdemeanor. And by sec. 6, any person advertising any office, place, &c., or the name of any person as broker, &c., or printing any advertisement or proposal for such purposes, is liable to a penalty of £50.

There are, however, several exceptions from the provisions of this statute. It does not extend to commissions or appointments in the band of gentlemen pensioners, or in his Majesty's yeoman guard, or in the Marshalsea, or the Court of the King's Palace at Westminster; or to purchases and exchanges of commissions in his Majesty's forces, at the regulated prices; or to anything done in relation thereto by authorised regimental agents not advertising and not receiving money, &c., in that behalf. (e) But officers receiving or paying, or agreeing to pay, more than the regulated prices, or paying agents for negotiating, on conviction by a court-martial, are to forfeit their commissions, and be cashiered. (f)

And it is provided also, that every person who shall sell his commission in his Majesty's forces, and not continue to hold any commission, and shall upon or in relation to such sale receive, directly or indirectly, any money, &c., beyond the regulated price of the commission sold, and every person who shall aid or assist such person therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

This Act also provides, that it shall not extend to any office excepted from the 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 16, or to any office which was legally saleable before the passing of this Act, and in the gift of any person by virtue of any office of which such person is or shall be possessed under any patent or appointment for his life; or to render invalid, or in any manner to affect any promise, covenant, trust, &c., entered into or declared before the passing of this Act, and which then was valid in law or equity. (g)

With respect to deputations to offices, it is enacted, that the Act shall not extend to prevent or make void any deputation to any office, in any case in which it is lawful to appoint a deputy, or any agreement, &c., lawfully made in respect of any allowance

It was one entire contract, and the defendant could not be called upon to pay, except upon the performance by the plaintiff of the whole consideration. East India service, and divers other officers in the said regiment, agreed with A. G. that the said lieutenant and other officers should subscribe and pay to the said A. G., being a major and their senior in the said regiment, and that he should accept from them a certain sum of money in consideration of his resigning his said position as major in the said regiment, and creating a vacancy of major therein, and the money was paid to A. G., and he resigned his said position in pursuance of the said agreement; it was held that the agreement was illegal, under the 49 Geo. 3, c. 126, s. 4, and that a bond given in pursuance of it was void. (o)

The sale of an East India Director's nomination to a cadetship is within the 49 Geo. 3, c. 126, s. 3, although by the practice of the Company such nomination is given only in the form of a presentation of the party by the Director to the Court of Directors, 'provided he shall appear to' them 'eligible for that station,' and he must afterwards be examined by the committee appointed for that purpose, and passed: and although the nomination only gives the party, when examined and passed, a right to go out to India, which he must do at his own expense, and obtain a commission on his landing; but before that time he receives no pay from the Company, and is not under their control. For the object of the enactment was to prevent all corrupt bargains for the sale of patronage in matters of public concernment; and with that view it is immaterial whether that to which the nomination is sold can be described with most critical correctness by any of the terms, 'office, commission, place, or employment.' And a cadetship may be described in an indictment under the Act as an 'office, commission, place, and employment.' (p)

A., an attorney, who held the offices of clerk of the peace for a liberty, clerk to the commissioners of land and assessed taxes, clerk to the commissioners of sewers, clerk to the magistrates, clerk to the deputy-lieutenants, steward of divers manors, and coroner to the said liberty, entered into articles of partnership with B., by which, after reciting that he held many offices, &c., and that it had been agreed that they should enter into partnership 'in the said business and in the emoluments of the said offices, &c., upon the terms thereafter expressed,' it was agreed that they should enter into partnership for twenty years, and that 'all the profits and emoluments arising from the said offices,' &c., during the said partnership, should be considered as partnership property, and distributed accordingly; it was also agreed that if A. died within the term, then, during such period as no son of A. should be a partner in the said business, B. should be interested in one moiety of the said business, and the executors of A. should be entitled to the profits of the other moiety of the said business, to be applied as part of his personal estate; and it was held that the agreement was not a contract for the sale of an office within the 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 16 or 49 Geo. 3, c. 126. CHAPTER THE SIXTEENTH.

OF BRIBERY.

BRIBERY is the receiving or offering any undue reward by or to any person whatsoever, whose ordinary profession or business relates to the administration of public justice, in order to influence his behaviour in office, and incline him to act contrary to the known rules of honesty and integrity. (a) And it seems that this offence will be committed by any person in an official situation, who shall corruptly use the power or interest of his place for rewards or promises: as in the case of one who was clerk to the agent for French prisoners of war, and indicted for taking bribes in order to procure the exchange of some of them out of their turn. (b) And bribery sometimes signifies the taking or giving of a reward for offices of a public nature. (c) Corrupt and illegal practices in giving rewards or making promises, in order to procure votes in the elections of members to serve in Parliament, are also denominated bribery, and punishable by common law, and by statute. (d) So giving refreshments to voters before they vote, in order to induce them to vote for a particular candidate, is bribery at common law. (e) And the attempt to influence persons serving as jurymen corruptly to one side, by gifts or promises (which, with other practices tending to influence a jury, will be considered in treating of the crime called embracery), (f) may be mentioned as a species of bribery.

The law abhors the least tendency to corruption; and upon the principle which has been already mentioned, of an attempt to commit even a misdemeanor, being itself a misdemeanor (g) attempts to bribe, though unsuccessful, have in several cases been held to be criminal. Thus, it is laid down generally, that if a party offers a bribe to a judge, meaning to corrupt him in a case depending before him, and the judge takes it not; yet this is an offence punishable by law in the party that offers it. (h) And it has been held to be a misdemeanor to attempt to bribe a cabinet minister, and a member of the Privy Council, to give the defendant an office in the colonies. (i) And an information was granted against a man for promising money to a member of a corporation, to induce him to vote for the election of a mayor. (j) An information also appears to have been exhibited against a person for attempting by bribery to influence a jurymen in giving his verdict. (k) Where a police officer was offered £1,000 to assist a party in obtaining possession of a ward of the Court of Chancery, who had a fortune of £5,000, and who afterwards married such party; Lord Eldon, C., said 'the endeavour to bribe a man to commit an offence is itself a very serious offence, and the person who made that offer may not be aware of his danger.' Bribery at elections for members of Parliament.

Bribery at elections for members of Parliament was always a crime at common law, and consequently punishable by indictment or information; (m) but in order to enforce the common law, and because it had not been found sufficient to prevent the evil, considerable penalties have been imposed upon this offence by different statutes.

7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 4. Contracts, &c., to procure election void, and persons making them to forfeit £300.

The 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 4, enacts, that all contracts, promises, bonds, and securities to procure any return of any member to serve in Parliament, or anything relating thereunto, shall be void; and that whoever makes or gives such contract, security, promise, or bond, or any gift or reward, to procure a false or double return, shall forfeit three hundred pounds. (n)

The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102 consolidated and amended the laws relating to bribery, treating and undue influence at elections of members of Parliament.

Sec. 2. 'The following persons shall be deemed guilty of bribery, and shall be punishable accordingly:—

1. 'Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure or to endeavour to procure, any money, or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person in order to induce any voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or shall corruptly do any such Act as aforesaid, on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election:

2. 'Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, give or procure, or agree to give or procure, or offer, promise, or promise to procure or to endeavour to procure, any office, place, or employment to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce such voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or shall corruptly do any such Act as aforesaid, on account of any voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election:

3. 'Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement as aforesaid, to or for any person, in order to induce such person to procure, or endeavour to procure, the return of any person to serve in Parliament, or the vote of any voter at any election:

4. 'Every person who shall, upon or in consequence of any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement, procure or engage, promise, or endeavour to procure the return of any person to serve in Parliament, or the vote of any voter at any election :

5. 'Every person who shall advance or pay, or cause to be paid, any money to or to the use of any other person with the intent that such money or any part thereof shall be expended in bribery at any election, or who shall knowingly pay or cause to be paid any money to any person in discharge or repayment of any money wholly or in part expended in bribery at any election.

'And any person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, and shall also be liable to forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit; provided always, that the aforesaid enactment shall not extend or be construed to extend to any money paid or agreed to be paid for or on account of any legal expenses bonâ fide incurred at or concerning any election.'

Sec. 3. 'The following persons shall also be deemed guilty of bribery, and shall be punishable accordingly : —

1. 'Every voter who shall, before or during any election, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, receive, agree, or contract for any money, gift, loan, or valuable consideration, office, place, or employment for himself or for any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting, at any election :

2. 'Every person who shall, after any election, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, receive any money or valuable consideration on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting, or having induced any other person to vote or to refrain from voting, at any election.

'And any person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, and shall also be liable to forfeit the sum of ten pounds to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit.'

Penalty.

Sec. 4. 'Every candidate at an election, who shall corruptly by himself, or by or with any person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf, at any time either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly, give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision to or for any person, in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote or refrain from voting, at such election, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating, and shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds to any person who shall sue for the same, with full costs of suit; and every voter who shall corruptly accept or take any such meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, shall be incapable of voting at such election, and his vote, if given, shall be utterly void and of none effect.'

Undue influence defined.

Sec. 5. 'Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, make use of, or threaten to make use of, any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict or threaten the infliction, by himself or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any other manner practise intimidation upon or against any person in order to induce or compel such person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, at any election, or who shall, by abduction, duress, or any fraudulent device or contrivance, impede, prevent, or otherwise interfere with the free exercise of the franchise of any voter, or shall thereby compel, induce, or prevail upon any voter, either to give or to refrain from giving his vote at any election, shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence, and shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment, and shall also be liable to forfeit the sum of fifty pounds to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit.'

Penalty.

Sec. 6. When it is proved before a revising barrister that any person has been convicted of bribery or undue influence, or has had judgment against him for any penal sum recovered for bribery, treating, or undue influence, the barrister is to expunge from the list of voters the name of such person, or disallow his claim to be inserted, and make a separate list of such persons.

No cockades, &c., to be given at elections.

Sec. 7. 'No candidate before, during, or after any election shall in regard to such election, by himself or agent, directly or indirectly, give or provide to or for any person having a vote at such election, or to or for any inhabitant of the county, city, borough, or place for which such election is had, any cockade, ribbon, or other mark of distinction; and every person so giving or providing shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of two pounds to such person as shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit; and all payments made for or on account of any chairing, or any such cockade, ribbon, or mark of distinction as aforesaid, or of any bands of music or flags or banners, shall be deemed illegal payments within this Act.'

Penalty.

Sec. 8. No voter is to be compelled to serve as a special constable during an election unless he consents so to act, or shall be liable to any fine for refusing to act. Sec. 9 provides for the recovery of penalties imposed by the Act.

Costs and expenses of prosecutions.

Sec. 10. 'It shall be lawful for any Criminal Court, before which any prosecution shall be instituted for any offence against the provisions of this Act, to order payment to the prosecutor of such costs and expenses as to the said Court shall appear to have been reasonably incurred in and about the conduct of such prosecution: provided always, that no indictment for bribery or undue influence shall be triable before any Court of quarter sessions.'

Sec. 12. 'In case of any indictment or information by a private prosecutor for any offence against the provisions of this Act, if judgment shall be given for the defendant, he shall be entitled to recover from the prosecutor the costs sustained by the defendant by reason of such indictment or information, such costs to be taxed by the proper officer of the Court in which such judgment shall be given.'

Sec. 13. 'It shall not be lawful for any Court to order payment of the costs of a prosecution for any offence against the provisions of this Act, unless the prosecutor shall, before or upon the finding of the indictment or the granting of the information, enter into a recognizance, with two sufficient sureties, in the sum of two hundred pounds (to be acknowledged in like manner as is now required in cases of writs of certiorari awarded at the instance of a defendant in an indictment), with the conditions following; that is to say, that the prosecutor shall conduct the prosecution with effect, and shall pay to the defendant or defendants, in case he or they shall be acquitted, his or their costs.'

Sec. 14. 'No person shall be liable to any penalty or forfeiture hereby enacted or imposed, unless some prosecution, action, or suit for the offence committed shall be commenced against such person within the space of one year next after such offence against this Act shall be committed, and unless such person shall be summoned or otherwise served with writ or process within the same space of time, so as such summons or service of writ or process shall not be prevented by such person absconding or withdrawing out of the jurisdiction of the Court out of which such writ or other process shall have issued; and in case of any such prosecution, suit, or process as aforesaid, the same shall be proceeded with and carried on without any wilful delay.' (g)

Sec. 23. 'The giving or causing to be given to any voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such voter having polled or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment, by way of refreshment, or any money or ticket to enable such voter to obtain refreshment, shall be deemed an illegal act, and the person so offending shall forfeit the sum of forty shillings for each offence to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit.' (r)

Sec. 36. 'If any candidate at any election for any county, city, or borough shall be declared by any election committee guilty, by himself or his agents, of bribery, treating, or undue influence at such election, such candidate shall be incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament for such county, city, or borough during the Parliament then in existence.'

Sec. 38. Throughout this Act, in the construction thereof, except there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction, the word 'county' shall extend to and mean defendant, he shall recover costs from the prosecutor.

Prosecutor not to be entitled to costs unless he shall have entered into a recognizance to conduct prosecution and pay costs.

Limitation of actions.

Refreshments to voters on the days of nomination or polling declared illegal.

Candidates declared guilty of bribery incapable of being elected during Parliament then in existence.

(g) As to what is wilful delay within this section, see Taylor v. Vergette, 7 H. & N. 143. And the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, s. 5, extends this section to 'a misdemeanor or to any other offence under' the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 87, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, 'not punishable by a penalty or forfeiture, as well as to proceedings for any offence punishable by a penalty or forfeiture.' This seems to have been introduced to get rid of the doubt entertained in Reg. v. Leatham, 3 Law T. 504, as to whether

sec. 14 applied to an information for a misdemeanor, and not for a penalty or forfeiture: but it seems in terms only to apply to offences under the Acts; and not to common law offences.

(r) Sec. 35 renders parties in actions competent and compellable to give evidence as under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, and 'The Evidence Amendment Act, 1853;' but 'any such evidence shall not thereafter be used in any indictment or criminal proceeding under this Act against the party giving it.'

any county, riding, parts, or division of a county, stewardry, or combined counties respectively returning a member or members to serve in Parliament; and the words 'city or borough' shall mean any university, city, borough, town corporate, county of a city, county of a town, cinque port, district of burghs, or other place or combination of places (not being a county as hereinbefore defined), returning a member or members to serve in Parliament; and the word 'election' shall mean the election of any member or members to serve in Parliament; and the words 'returning officer' shall apply to any person or persons to whom, by virtue of his or their office under any law, custom, or statute, the execution of any writ or precept doth or shall belong for the election of a member or members to serve in Parliament, by whatever name or title such person or persons may be called; and the words 'revising barrister' shall extend to and include an assistant barrister and chairman, presiding in any Court held for the revision of the list of voters, or his deputy in Ireland, and a sheriff or Sheriff's Court of Appeal in Scotland, and every other person whose duty it may be to hold a court for the revision and correction of the lists or registers of voters in any part of the United Kingdom; and the word 'voter' shall mean any person who has or claims to have a right to vote in the election of a member or members to serve in Parliament; and the words 'candidate at an election' shall include all persons elected as members to serve in Parliament at such election, and all persons nominated as candidates, or who shall have declared themselves candidates at or before such election; and the words 'personal expenses,' as used herein with respect to the expenditure of any candidate in relation to any election, shall include the reasonable travelling expenses of such candidate, and the reasonable expenses of his living at hotels or elsewhere for the purposes of and in relation to such election.'

The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, s. 3, repeals so much of this section as defines 'candidate at an election,' and enacts that these words 'shall include all persons elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and all persons nominated as candidates at such election, or who shall have declared themselves candidates on or after the day of the issuing of the writ for such election, or after the dissolution or vacancy in consequence of which such writ shall have been issued: provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to impose any liability on any person nominated without his consent.' (s)

The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102 was amended by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87.

Astotravelling
voters.

Sec. 1. 'It shall be lawful for any candidate, or his agent by him appointed in writing according to the provisions of the first-mentioned Act, to provide conveyance for any voter for the purpose of polling at an election and not otherwise, but it shall not be lawful to pay any money or give any valuable consideration to a voter for or in respect of his travelling expenses for such purpose.' (t)

No payment,

The 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, further amends the law on these subjects.

Sec. 2. 'No payment (except in respect of the personal expenses

The section adds: 'It shall be the duty of the returning officer to publish, on or before the day of nomination, the name and address or the names and addresses of the agent or agents appointed in pursuance of this section. In the event of the death or legal incapacity of any agent appointed in pursuance of this section, the candidate shall forthwith appoint another agent in his place on giving notice to the returning officer of the name and address of the person so appointed, which shall be forthwith published by the returning officer.'

Sec. 3. 'All persons who have any bills, charges, or claims upon any candidate for or in respect of any election shall send in such bills, charges, or claims within one month from the day of the declaration of the election to such agent or agents as aforesaid, otherwise such persons shall be barred of their right to recover such claims, and every or any part thereof: provided always, that in case of the death within the said month of any person claiming the amount of such bill, charge, or claim, the legal representative of such person shall send in such bill, charge, or claim within one month after obtaining probate or letters of administration, or confirmation as executor, as the case may be, or the right to recover such claim shall be barred as aforesaid: provided also, that such bills, charges, and claims shall and may be sent in and delivered to the candidate, if, and so long as, during the said month, there shall, owing to death or legal incapacity, be no such agent.' (x)

Sec. 4. 'A detailed statement of all election expenses incurred by or on behalf of any candidate, including such excepted payments as aforesaid, shall, within two months after the election, (or in cases where by reason of the death of the creditor no bill has been sent in within such period of two months, then within one month after such bill has been sent in,) be made out and signed by the agent or, if there be more than one, by every agent who has paid the same (including the candidate in case of payments made by him), and delivered, with the bills and vouchers relative thereto, to the returning officer, and the returning officer for the time being shall, at the expense of the candidate, within fourteen days, insert or cause to be inserted an abstract of such statement, with the signature of the agent thereto, in some newspaper published or circulating in the county or place where the election was held; and any agent or candidate who makes default in delivering to the returning officer the statement required by this section shall incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds for every day during which he so makes default; and any agent or candidate who wilfully furnishes to the said returning officer an untrue statement shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, or in Scotland of an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment.' (y)

Sec. 6. 'In any indictment or information for bribery or undue influence, and in any action or proceeding for any penalty for bribery, treating, or undue influence, it shall be sufficient to allege that the defendant was at the election at or in connexion with which the offence is intended to be alleged to have been committed guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence (as the case may require); and in any criminal or civil proceedings in relation to any such offence the certificate of the returning officer in this behalf shall be sufficient evidence of the due holding of the election, and of any person therein named having been a candidate thereat.'

The 15 & 16 Viet. c. 57, which was passed for the more effectual inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections of members of Parliament, provides that, upon a joint address of both Houses of Parliament, Her Majesty may appoint commissioners to inquire into corrupt practices at elections, and makes provision for the conducting of such an inquiry. Sec. 8 empowers the commissioners to summon any person whose evidence they may deem material to the inquiry, and to require any person to produce books, papers, &c., necessary for arriving at the truth of the things to be inquired into by them; and provides that all persons 'shall answer all questions put to them by the commissioners touching the matters to be inquired into by them, and shall produce all books, papers, deeds and writings required of them, and in their custody or under their control according to the tenor of the summons: provided always that no statement made by any person in answer to any question put by such commissioners shall, except in cases of indictment for perjury committed in such answers, be admissible in evidence in any proceeding, civil or criminal.' Sec. 9 provided that persons implicated in corrupt practices, who were examined and made a faithful discovery, should be indemnified; but sec. 10 made it necessary that such person should have obtained a certificate from the commissioners that he had 'made a

Sec. 9. 'Where an election committee has reported to the House of Commons that certain persons named by them have been guilty of bribery or treating, and where it appears by the report of any commission of inquiry into corrupt practices at any election made to Her Majesty and laid before Parliament that certain persons named by them have been guilty of the offences of bribery or treating, and have not been furnished by them with certificates of indemnity, such report, with the evidence taken by the commission, shall be laid before the Attorney-General, with a view to his instituting a prosecution against such persons if the evidence should, in his opinion, be sufficient to support a prosecution.' The 2 Geo. 2, c. 24, did not take away the common law crime. But the Court of King's Bench would rarely proceed by information.

It may be well to notice the decisions on the repealed statutes in this place.

It was held that, notwithstanding the 2 Geo. 2, c. 24, which made the offender liable to forfeit five hundred pounds, bribery in elections of members to serve in Parliament remained a crime at common law; that the Legislature never meant to take away the common law crime, but to add a penal action; and that this appears by the words in the statute—‘or being otherwise lawfully convicted thereof.’(c) And a conviction upon an information granted by the Court of King’s Bench was just the same as if the party had been convicted upon an indictment.(d) But as the offender was equally liable to the penalties of the statute,(e) that Court would not interpose by information until the two years were expired,(f) in ordinary cases; though there might possibly be particular cases, founded on particular reasons, where it might be right to grant informations before the expiration of the time limited for commencing the prosecution on the statute.(g) And in one case, where the defendant had been convicted of bribery, and the time for bringing the penal action was not expired, the Court permitted him to enter into a recognizance to appear at the expiration of that time.(h)

There was a great difference between the two parts of sec. 7, of the 2 Geo. 2, c. 24. (i) The first part which was applicable to the voter, contained the word ‘ask,’ which was not repeated in the second. From this it might be taken that, in an action against the party tendering the bribe, proof should be required of more than a mere solicitation. Then, in the first part, the words went on thus, ‘or agree or contract for any money,’ the agreement, therefore, would subject the party to the penalty. (k) In the second part the words were ‘corrupt or procure.’ As to procuring, it was necessary that the vote should be actually given, but the corruption was complete by effecting an agreement amounting to corruption, although the vote was not given. If, therefore, A. gave money to B. to induce B. to vote for a candidate, and B. agreed to do so, in consideration of the gift, A. was liable to the penalty, for corrupting, although B. never gave the vote, (l) and two very learned judges thought that A. was equally liable, if B. never intended to vote according to the agreement at all, as A. had done all that lay with him; (m) and this opinion was held to be correct by the Court of Exchequer. (n)

Where a friend of the candidate gave an elector five guineas to vote, and took from him a note for that sum, but at the same time gave a counter note to deliver up the first note when the elector had voted, it was held to be an absolute gift and bribery within the Act, although the elector voted for the opposite party. (o) And laying a wager with the voter that he did not vote for a particular candidate was also bribery within the Act. (p) In an action upon this statute it was held, that, before the time of election, any one was a candidate for whom a vote was asked; and that it was not competent to the defendant to dispute a man's right of voting when he had asked him for his vote; it being immaterial whether the voter bribed had a right to vote or not, if he claimed to have such right. (q) A declaration upon this statute must have stated what the bribe was, and specified that the defendant took money or some other particular species of reward; and where it stated generally 'that the defendant did receive a gift or reward,' in the disjunctive, it was held bad in arrest of judgment, the charge being of a criminal nature. (r) And where the person corrupting was sued the same rule applied. And as the means of corrupting must be stated, so they must be stated accurately according to the facts. Where those means rest in agreement only, the actual agreement must be stated in order that the party may know what he has to answer, and may be able to plead the verdict, whatever it may be in another action, though it may not be necessary to state the matter with the same precision as in an action on the agreement supposing it were legal. (s) Where therefore a count stated that the defendant corrupted a voter by promising him to pay a debt of £41, and the evidence was a promise to pay the debt of £41 and the expenses in respect of the pledge of a boat for such debt, it was held that there was a fatal variance between the promise alleged and that proved by reason of the omission in the declaration of all mention of the expenses. (t) But where a count alleged that the defendant corrupted a voter by giving £10 and promising to pay £31 in addition, and the evidence proved the payment of the £10 and the promise to pay £31 and also the expenses of the pledge of the boat; it was held that the offence consisted in corrupting, which depends entirely on the means used in soliciting. The payment of £10 was undoubtedly corruption, and was sufficient to support this count, and that the promise to pay £31 more might be treated as surplusage, and, that being so, the omission to add 'and the expenses' was immaterial. (u)

The words of sec. 7 were all prospective, and they were construed as if they had been 'in order to give,' and 'in order to forbear to give,' and consequently they did not include a case where money was given to a voter after an election, for having voted for a candidate, there having been no agreement made before the election for giving such money. (v)

Payment of the travelling

Where voters for a member of Parliament had only been paid their actual travelling expenses, a difference of opinion has existed as to the legality of such payments; some committees of the House of Commons having held that such payments are legal, others (and probably theirs is the more correct opinion) that such payments are not legal, for it is obvious that such a mode of proceeding, if allowed, would lead to great abuses. (w) And it seems, at all events, that where the same sum is given to every voter coming from the same place to an election, for his travelling expenses, it is bribery; and it is not the less so though all the candidates agree in the payment of the same amount. (x) But where an action was brought by an agent of a candidate, to recover from him the amount so paid, Tindal, C. J., left it to the jury to say 'whether the sums were paid really and bonâ fide for travelling expenses, and travelling expenses only, or to induce the voters to give their votes. (x)

It has since, however, been decided by the House of Lords that such payments, though bonâ fide made for travelling expenses only, are illegal; and though they are now rendered legal to some extent by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, s. 1, (xx) the case contains so much that is valuable in other respects that it is here inserted.

bribery.

Every promise to pay and every payment of travelling expenses, though fair and reasonable, to a voter in order to induce him to vote; that is, every promise upon any condition, express or implied, that he should be paid his travelling expense if he voted for a particular candidate, is bribery within the meaning of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 2, No. 1. But where there is both a promise and a payment in pursuance of it, only one penalty is incurred within that clause. It is a clear proposition of law, that if a man employs an agent for a perfectly legal purpose, and that agent does an illegal act, that act does not affect the principal unless it is shown that the principal directed the agent so to act, or really meant he should so act, or afterwards ratified the illegal act, or he appointed one to be his agent to do both legal and illegal acts, to do everything, in short, which he might think proper to support the interests of the candidate; if the candidate gives his agent such a general authority, and the agent is guilty of bribery, the candidate is no doubt responsible for it. induce him to vote at an election ; another count alleged that the defendant corruptly gave money to the voter, on account of his having voted at the said election. The defendant was a candidate at an election for Cambridge, and a printed circular had been prepared, whereby out-voters were requested to return and vote for the defendant, and in his committee-room the question was discussed whether the expense of bringing up voters was legal, and the opinion of Tindal, C. J., in Bremridge v. Campbell (yy) was read, on which the defendant said, 'I think the expenses are legal,' but limited it to the payment of expenses out of pocket ; and thereupon a clerk of the defendant's agent, in his presence, but without any express direction from him or his agent, wrote at the bottom of each circular the words, 'Your railway expenses will be paid.' In consequence of receiving one of the circulars, a voter went from Huntingdon to Cambridge in order to vote, and voted at the election for the defendant, and he was paid eight shillings for his expenses from Huntingdon by the defendant's agent. Parke, B., told the jury, that if they were satisfied upon the evidence that the defendant did, by himself or any other person on his behalf authorized so to do, promise money to the voter, in order to induce him to vote for the defendant, they must find for the plaintiff on the first count, although the money so promised was no more than the fair and reasonable expenses of the voter's travelling from Huntingdon to Cambridge, and back again ; and that if they were satisfied upon the evidence that the defendant did, by himself or any other person on his behalf authorized by him so to do, give money to the voter on account of, that is to say, that the moving cause of his giving such money was the voter's having voted for the defendant, they must find for the plaintiff on the second count, although the money so given was no more than the fair and reasonable expenses of the voter's travelling from Huntingdon to Cambridge and back again, and although the defendant honestly believed that he was committing no offence thereby. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on both counts ; and, upon a bill of exceptions, it was held that it was necessary to show that the circular was written by the authority, expressed or implied, of the defendant, and that there was not only evidence to go to the jury, but that they were well warranted in finding that both the promise and the payment were made by the authority, express or implied, of the defendant ; and that although the defendant was perfectly innocent of any intention to violate the law, yet if he did authorize the memorandum to be added to the note, and that note was sent to the voter by his authority, he was acting in violation of the statute ; but that the plaintiff ought not to recover two penalties, one for the promise to pay and the other for performing the promise by payment ; for where there was a promise to pay, and a payment in pursuance of that promise, the Legislature meant that to be only one act of bribery. (z)

(yy) Supra, p. 234.

(z) Cooper v. Slade, supra. The plaintiff consented to enter a nolle prosequi to the second count, and had judgment on the first count. Lord Wensleydale, at the trial, feeling certain that the Legislature did not intend to impose two penalties, one for the promise and another for giving the money, thought that any previous promise that had been made must be dismissed in considering whether the payment was 'corruptly' made ; that the Act did not refer to payment pursuant to a promise

But payment of the expense of taking up the freedom of voters is clearly illegal. (a)

What was giving a bribe within the 2 Geo. 2, c. 24, s. 7.

A declaration under the 2 Geo. 2, c. 24, s. 7, for corrupting a voter by corruptly giving the voter the sum of £10, as a reward to him to give his vote, was supported by evidence that the defendant gave the voter a card in one room, which the voter presented to a person in another room, who thereupon gave him the money. (b) And it was held, in the same case, that the plaintiff might prove that the defendant on the same day, and at the same place, gave cards to other persons, who also obtained money by presenting them to the person in the other room. (c)

Indictment.

It seems that an indictment against a voter for giving a false answer at an election is insufficient if it merely state that the voter gave the answer at an election, and does not aver the writ for holding the election, or that the election was duly held, (d) and the same point would have applied to an indictment for bribery; but the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, s. 6, (e) makes it sufficient to allege that the defendant was guilty of bribery at the election.

Construction of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 2. Several offences.

Where the first count charged the defendant with having paid money to one Gilbert with intent that it should be applied in bribery at an election, and several other counts charged the defendant with the actual bribery of several persons named in these counts, and the only act of the defendant was giving £2,000 to Gilbert for the purposes of the election, and Gilbert was the person who had bribed the persons named in the second and other counts, and the jury found the defendant guilty on all the counts, it was objected that, as the defendant was found guilty on the first count, he ought not to have been found guilty upon the other counts, it appearing that there was but one act, namely, that of paying money by him to an agent; but it was held that this objection, if available at all, it would only be by application at the trial that the prosecutor should be compelled to elect upon which count he would proceed. There was no doubt that a man by one and the same act might commit several distinct offences. By the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 2, No. 5, paying money to any person with intent that such person should use it to bribe electors, is declared to be equivalent to bribery, and, as such, a misdemeanor, though no person was actually bribed; and by No. 1, giving money to an elector to induce him to vote is declared to be bribery, and as such a misdemeanor; but the offences are not the same, though it may be said that they arise from one and the same act. It was further objected, that as the defendant had employed subordinate agents, by whom the bribes were given, he could not previously made, but to a payment afterwards without any previous promise; and that the reasonable construction to be put upon the Act was, that if a man gave money to a voter as a reward for having voted for him, that being the moving cause of the payment, it must be a corrupt payment within the meaning of the Act. But in the House of Lords his Lordship said, 'I have very great doubt whether I was right in holding that if a candidate, after the election, pays a voter money, the moving cause of his doing so being that the voter has given him his vote, the payment is corrupt.'

be convicted of having bribed the voters himself; but it was held, that if a man employs an agent to corrupt voters, and that agent in carrying such general instructions into effect employs subordinate agents within the scope of the authority received from the principal, such principal, with reference to the express terms of this statute, as well as upon general principles of law, will be guilty of a misdemeanor as a principal. (f)

In an action for bribery at an election it was held, that the register of voters at an election made in pursuance of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, ss. 48, 49, is a document of such a public nature as to be admissible upon its mere production by the returning officer, and therefore an examined or certified copy of it is admissible; and where the plaintiff, having given in evidence a copy of the writ and return from the office of the clerk of the crown, certified by a clerk in the office to be a true copy of the original writ and examined therewith, and the defendant's counsel, having suffered it to be given in evidence as a certified copy, at the close of the case objected that the copies of the writ and return were not duly certified copies; it was held that, assuming that they were not, there was no ground for granting a new trial, for the objection came too late, and might have been cured by proving that they were examined copies, if it had been taken at the proper time. It seems that in such an action proof of the writ, return, and register of voters, is requisite, and that parol evidence of an election having taken place is not sufficient. (g) And on an indictment for personating a voter at an election for a borough, it has been held that the writ to the sheriff must be produced in order to prove that the election was duly held. (h) But where an offence is complete before the return is made, as where the offence is preventing a voter from voting, the return need not be given in evidence. (i) The 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, s. 6, (k) makes the certificate of the returning officer evidence of the election.

Where a book, which was in writing and duly signed, contained the register of voters, Byles, J., held, that though there ought to be a copy of the list printed in a book and duly signed, in order to constitute a proper register, yet this register, though irregular, was valid, and admissible in evidence. Where an action for bribery was brought in Essex, and the sum of £10 had been paid by the defendant to the London correspondents of the Harwich Bank to the credit of a person who had a boat in his possession for a debt, and a few days afterwards the boat was released, it was held that the £10 must be taken upon the facts to have been paid at Harwich, and therefore the venue was properly laid in Essex. mayor, or of a councillor, auditor, or assessor of any borough, shall, after the passing of this Act, ask or take any money or other reward, by way of gift, loan, or other device, or agree or contract for any money, gift, office, employment, or other reward whatsoever, to give or forbear to give his vote in any such election, or if any person, by himself or any person employed by him, shall, by any gift or reward, or by any promise, agreement, or security for any gift or reward, corrupt or procure, or offer to corrupt or procure, any person to give or forbear to give his vote in any such election, such person so offending in any of the cases aforesaid shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of fifty pounds of lawful money of Great Britain, to be recovered, with full costs of suit, by any one who shall sue for the same, by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information in any of his Majesty's courts of record at Westminster; and any person offending in any of the cases aforesaid, being lawfully convicted thereof, shall for ever be disabled to vote in any election in such borough, or in any municipal or Parliamentary election whatever in any part of the United Kingdom, and also shall for ever be disabled to hold, exercise, or enjoy any office or franchise to which he then shall or at any time afterwards may be entitled as a burgess of such borough, as if such person was naturally dead.'

Sec. 55. 'If any person offending in any of the cases aforesaid shall, within the space of twelve months next after such election as aforesaid, discover any other person offending in any of the cases aforesaid, so that such other person be thereon convicted, such person so discovering, and not having been before that time convicted of any such offence, shall be indemnified and discharged from all penalties and disabilities which he shall then have incurred by any such offence.' (n)

Sec. 56. 'No person shall be made liable to any incapacity, disability, forfeiture, or penalty by this Act imposed, in any of the cases aforesaid, unless prosecution be commenced within two years after such incapacity, disability, forfeiture, or penalty shall be incurred, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.'

The 54th section contemplates three descriptions of offences: first, that of procuring the party to give his vote for a particular candidate, that is, when he acts in pursuance of the corrupt agreement; secondly, that of corrupting the voter, where the bribe is offered and accepted, an actual agreement is made, and the party promises to act upon it; the third offence is a new one, not found in the old Bribery Act, where the whole that appears is the mere offer of a bribe, refused on the other side, or not assented to at the time. (n)

An employment is a reward within the meaning of this section. The offence of corrupting a voter is complete where the two parties have agreed, the one to offer, the other to accept, a bribe as the condition of voting for a particular person, whether the person who has agreed to vote, votes or not for such person, or whether he intended so to vote or not. But where a bribe is offered, but not accepted, the offence is that of offering to corrupt. A declaration in debt for the penalty of £50, under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 54, alleged that the defendant did corrupt one J. W., who had a right to vote at an election of councillors for a borough, by corruptly promising to give the said J. W., if he should vote at the said election for certain candidates, employment in hauling stones at and for certain hire and reward to be paid for the same; and it was held upon demurrer that the declaration was sufficient. The question was, whether any difference was made between the asker and the offerer of a gift or reward, as to the nature of the thing asked or offered. To ascertain what is the 'gift or reward' contemplated in the latter branch of the clause, the Court must look at the former part of the section, and there are found in conjunction the words 'any money, gift, office, employment, or other reward whatsoever.' An employment, therefore, is there considered as a reward; and by the common sense of mankind it is so, where the party to whom it is offered wants employment. It falls, therefore, equally within the more general words of the latter part of the clause. But whether this employment was in the particular case given as a reward within the object of the Act, was a question for the jury; if only the ordinary wages were given they might probably find that the employment was not given for a corrupt reward. (o) The demurrer having been withdrawn by leave of the Court, the defendant pleaded not guilty, and on the trial it appeared that J. W., having promised his vote in favour of certain candidates, the defendant told him that if he would vote for certain other candidates, he would give him employment in hauling stones at certain weekly wages; J. W. answered that it was a good offer, but that the difficulty was how he should get off his promise; that he would consider of it, and would see the defendant again the next Friday. No further communication, however, took place, and J. W. eventually voted for the candidates to whom he had originally promised his vote. It was objected for the defendant that the evidence did not prove a corrupting of the voter, as charged in the declaration, but a mere offering to corrupt; and the plaintiff was nonsuited; but the Court, upon a rule to show cause why there should not be a new trial, held that if it were proved that there was an agreement to vote in pursuance of the offer, no matter whether the party intended to perform it or not, the offence of corrupting was complete. The evidence given in this case might be construed to prove that the offer was accepted; if the jury should be of that opinion the offence of corrupting was complete; but on the other hand they might well come to the conclusion that the voter had not made up his mind, but took time to consider further whether he would accept the offer; in that case the offence of corrupting was not complete, but it was a mere offer to corrupt within the third clause of the statute. (p)

Some cases decided upon the 2 Geo. 2, c. 24, s. 8, may throw light upon the construction of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 55. On that Act it was decided that the circumstance of a party having been, within the limited time, a plaintiff in an action on the statute, and having prosecuted it to judgment, did not prove him to have been the first discoverer. Lord Mansfield, C. J., observed, that the Court had not said, nor would say, that a plaintiff cannot be the discoverer; but that the Act does not make him so, or consider him as the discoverer; and that as the plaintiff could not be the witness himself in the action, some other person must have been the witness; it was not therefore to be presumed, without any evidence of it, that the plaintiff was the first discoverer. (g) And where one person procured another to make an affidavit of facts amounting to bribery, and then prosecuted a third person upon these facts to conviction, it was held that the person making the affidavit was the discoverer. (r) Not only a verdict, but judgment must be obtained to satisfy the clause; but when judgment is obtained it will relate, for the purpose of the indemnity, to the time when the discovery was first made. CHAPTER THE SEVENTEENTH.

OF NEGLECTING OR DELAYING TO DELIVER ELECTION WRITS.

THE 53 Geo. 3, c. 89, was passed for the purpose of effecting the more expeditious and regular conveyance of writs for the election of members to serve in Parliament. It enacts, that the messenger, or pursuivant of the great seal, or his deputy, shall, after the receipt of such writs, forthwith carry such of them as shall be directed to the sheriffs of London or Middlesex, to the respective officers of such sheriffs, and the other writs to the general post office in London, and there deliver them to the postmaster general for the time being, or to such other person as the postmaster shall depute to receive the same (which deputation the postmaster is thereby required to make), who, on receipt thereof, shall give an acknowledgement in writing, expressing therein the time of delivery, and shall keep a duplicate of such acknowledgement signed by the parties respectively to whom and by whom the same shall be so delivered; and that the postmaster or his deputy shall despatch all such writs free of postage, by the first post or mail, after the receipt thereof, under covers directed to the proper officers, to whom the said writs shall be respectively directed, accompanied with proper directions to the postmaster or deputy postmaster of the place, or nearest to the place where such officers shall hold their office, requiring such postmaster or deputy forthwith to carry such writs respectively to such office, and to deliver them there to the officers to whom they shall be respectively directed, or their deputies, who are required to give to such postmaster or deputy a memorandum in writing, acknowledging the receipt of every such writ, and setting forth the day and the hour the same was delivered by such postmaster or deputy, and which memorandum shall also be signed by such postmaster or deputy, who are required to transmit the same by the first or second post afterwards to the postmaster general or his deputy at the general post office in London, who are required to make an entry thereof in a proper book for that purpose, and to file the memorandum along with the duplicate of the said acknowledgement, signed by the messenger, to the intent that the same may be inspected or produced upon all proper occasions by any person interested in such elections. (a)

The statute, after directing that all persons to whom the writs for the election of members to Parliament ought to be and are usually directed, shall, within a month, send to the postmaster general an account of the places where they shall hold their offices, and so from time to time, as often as such places shall be changed; and of the post town nearest to such offices; or in case any such

(c) And it further enacts, that whereas the messenger of the great seal and his deputy have from time to time received certain other fees for the conveyance and upon the delivery of these writs, such fees shall cease from the passing of the Act; and that neither the messenger nor his deputy, nor any other person, shall receive or take any fee, reward or gratuity whatsoever, for the conveyance or delivery of any such writ. (d)

The sixth section enacts, 'that every person concerned in the transmitting or delivery of any such writ as aforesaid who shall wilfully neglect or delay to deliver or transmit any such writ, or accept any fee, or do any other matter or thing in violation of this Act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may upon any conviction upon any indictment or information in his Majesty's Court of King's Bench be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the Court for such misdemeanor.'

Offences committed in Scotland may be punished by a fine or imprisonment, as the judge before whom the offender shall be tried and convicted may direct. (e)

CHAPTER THE EIGHTEENTH.

OF DEALING IN SLAVES.

THE 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, repeals all the Acts and enactments relating to the slave trade, and the abolition thereof, and the exportation or importation of slaves, except so far as they have repealed any prior Acts or enactments, or may have been acted upon, or may be expressly confirmed by the present Act. It then enacts, that it shall not be lawful (except in such special cases as are thereafter mentioned) to deal in slaves, or to remove, import, ship, tranship, &c., any persons as slaves, or to fit out, employ, &c., any vessels in order to accomplish such unlawful objects, or to lend money, &c., or to become guarantee, &c., for agents in relation to such objects, or in any other manner to engage, directly or indirectly, therein, as a partner, agent, or otherwise; or to ship, &c., any money, goods, or effects, to be employed in accomplishing any of these unlawful objects; or to command, or embark on board, or contract for commanding, or embarking on board, any vessel, &c., in any capacity, knowing that such vessel, &c., is employed, or intended to be employed, in such unlawful objects; or to insure, or contract for insuring, any slaves, or other property, employed, or intended to be employed, in accomplishing any of these unlawful objects. (a) Pecuniary penalties and forfeitures are then imposed upon persons offending, by engaging in such unlawful objects. (b) And the statute then proceeds to subject certain offenders to punishments of a more serious nature.

c. 113.

By sec. 9, 'if any subject or subjects of his Majesty, or any person or persons residing, or being within any of the dominions, forts, settlements, factories, or territories, now or hereafter belonging to his Majesty, or being in his Majesty's occupation or possession, or under the government of the united company of merchants of England trading to the East Indies, shall, except in such cases as are in and by this Act permitted, (c) after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, upon the high seas, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral has jurisdiction, knowingly and wilfully carry away, convey, or remove, or aid or assist in carrying away, conveying, or removing, any person or persons as a slave or slaves, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being imported, or brought as a slave or slaves, into any island, colony, country, territory, or place whatsoever, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being sold, transferred, used, or dealt with, as a slave or slaves; or shall,

The 1 Vict. c. 91, s. 1, recites the preceding section, and provides that, after the 1st of October, 1837, no person convicted of any such offence shall suffer death, but instead thereof shall be liable to transportation (e) for life, or for any term not less than fifteen (f) years, or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, in the common gaol or house of correction, for any term not exceeding three years, and the offender may be directed to be kept in solitary confinement for any portion or portions of such imprisonment, or of such imprisonment with hard labour, not exceeding one month at any one time, and not exceeding three months in any one year, as to the Court in its discretion shall seem meet. In February 1845 the Felicidade, a Brazilian schooner, bound on a voyage from the Brazils to Africa for the purpose of bringing back a cargo of slaves, arrived off the African coast, and while she was hovering within sixteen miles of the shore, and within six degrees north latitude, was observed by Her Majesty's ship of war Wasp, stationed off the slave coast for the prevention of the slave trade, and then under the command of Captain Usher, who, upon approaching the Felicidade, manned two boats, and gave the command of them to Lieutenant Stupart, one of his officers, with orders to board the Felicidade, and if she appeared to be fitted up for the slave trade to capture her. Lieutenant Stupart, in obedience to these orders, went with the two boats to the Felicidade. Cerquiera, the captain, immediately surrendered, and he and all his crew, except Majavel and three others, were conveyed on board the Wasp. At the time of her capture the Felicidade was fitted up for the reception of a cargo of slaves, and was within sixteen miles of the shore. The next day Captain Usher, having removed from the Felicidade the three men who had been left with Majavel, sent back Cerquiera to the Felicidade, manned her with sixteen British seamen, and placed her under the command of Lieutenant Stupart, and directed him to steer a particular course in pursuit of a vessel capable of being seen from the Wasp, although then invisible from the Felicidade. Lieutenant Stupart accordingly steered that course, and the next morning he descried the Echo, a Brazilian brigantine, commanded by Serva. He chased her, and on coming up with her the following night fired a pistol as a signal to bring to, got into the jolly-boat, and hoisted British colours. The captain of the Echo hailed the men in the boat, and asked who they were, and, upon being informed that they were English, immediately set sail. Lieutenant Stupart continued the chase, and overtook the Echo the next night within ten miles of the African coast, when and where she surrendered. The lieutenant had at that time under his command Mr. Palmer, a midshipman, and sixteen British seamen; he ordered Mr. Palmer and eight of the seamen to take charge of the Echo during the night. On Mr. Palmer going on board the Echo, he found in her Serva, Serva's nephew, twenty-five men, and a cargo of four hundred and thirty-four slaves, and by the direction of Lieutenant Stupart, the vessels being at that time close together, sent Serva, his nephew, and eleven of the crew to the Felicidade, where they remained during the night in the custody of Lieutenant Stupart. During the chase and at the time of the surrender Lieutenant Stupart wore his uniform, and at the time of the surrender and capture told Serva he was going to take them to Her Majesty's ship the Wasp, for being engaged in the slave trade. The Wasp had printed instructions on board. Lieutenant Stupart had not any printed instructions on board the Felicidade, and did not show any other authority than his uniform and the British ensign. He had, however, boarded the Echo several times before, and to Serva was well known as an officer in Her Majesty's navy. The slaves had been shipped on board the Echo at Lagos. The next morning after the capture Lieutenant Stupart took with him Serva's nephew to the Echo, and placed Mr. Palmer and nine British seamen under his command on board the Felicidade, in order that he might take charge of her and of Serva, Cerquiera, Majavel, and several others of the Echo's crew. Within an hour afterwards Serva, Majavel, and some of the rest, conspired together to kill all the English on board the Felicidade, and take her; and in pursuance of that conspiracy rose upon Mr. Palmer and his men, and after a short conflict succeeded in killing them, Majavel having in the course of that conflict stabbed and thrown overboard Mr. Palmer. Cerquiera, though solicited by Serva to join in the plot, refused to do so, and endeavoured to dissuade him from carrying it into execution; and on the trial of an indictment against Serva and others engaged with him in the transaction for the murder of Mr. Palmer, at Exeter Assizes, Platt, B., held that the Felicidade was in the lawful custody of Her Majesty's officers, that all on board that vessel were within Her Majesty's Admiralty jurisdiction, and that if the prisoners plotted together to slay all the English on board and run away with the vessel, and in carrying their design into execution Majavel slew Mr. Palmer, and the others were aiding and assisting in the commission of that act, they should be found guilty of murder; and upon a case reserved it was contended on the part of the prisoners that both the Felicidade and Echo were wrongfully taken, and that the prisoners had a right to regain their freedom by any means in their power, and consequently that no felony had been committed. It was answered, on the part of the prosecution, that the Felicidade and Echo were lawfully taken under the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, and 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 74, and the Portuguese and Brazilian treaties as to slave trading; and that the prisoners were in lawful custody, and the Felicidade in the lawful custody of the Queen's officers; but it was held that there was a want of jurisdiction in an English Court to try the murder committed on board the Felicidade; and if the lawful possession of that vessel by the British Crown, through its officers, would be sufficient to give jurisdiction, there was no evidence brought before the Court to show that the possession was lawful. (n)

Where some counts of an indictment on the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, s. 10, omitted the words 'knowingly and wilfully,' which are used in that section in describing the offences charged in those counts, it was admitted that these counts were bad. (o)

Indictments.
'Knowingly and wilfully.'

Where a count stated that the prisoner in the fourth year of Queen Victoria, at London, and within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, did illegally and feloniously man, navigate, equip, despatch, use and employ a certain ship called the Augusta, in order to accomplish a certain object, which (by the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113) was declared unlawful, viz., to deal and trade in slaves; and the three following counts only varied from the first in describing the object of the several acts charged to have been done by the prisoner differently, as in the statute; and it was objected that each count was bad as charging distinct felonies, the statute making it a felony to fit out, man, navigate, equip, despatch, use or employ any ship in order to accomplish any of the objects thereby declared unlawful, and each count charging the prisoner with having done all the acts before mentioned, each of which would have been of itself a felony, if done with the object stated in the Act; it was held that each count contained a charge of one felony only, the whole being alleged to have been done to accomplish one and the same single object, the essence of the felony consisting in using the means described in the Act to accomplish that object. It was also contended, that these counts were bad for not negating the exceptions in the act of circumstances, which might render the transaction lawful; but it was held that these exceptions are virtually repealed by the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 73, s. 12, and that for this purpose the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, s. 10, must be considered as if they had never existed; and as the offences in the indictment are charged to have been committed in the reign of her present Majesty, they must necessarily have been after the passing of the repealing Act. It was further objected, that the indictment did not allege that the prisoner was a British subject, or that the offence was committed within Her Majesty's dominions; but it was held that, as the offence was stated in each count to have been committed at London, within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, and therefore primâ facie at least within the district mentioned in the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 36, s. 2, the indictment did in substance allege the offence to have been committed within Her Majesty's dominions. (p)

The Act extends to acts done out of the British dominions.

Upon an indictment under sec. 10 for feloniously fitting out a vessel for the purpose of dealing in slaves, it was held that the provisions of the Act are not confined to acts done by British subjects in furtherance of the slave trade in England or the British colonies, but apply to acts done by British subjects in furtherance of that trade in places not part of the British dominions. And in order to convict a party who is charged with having employed and loaded a vessel for the purpose of slave trading, it is not necessary to show that the vessel which carried out the goods was intended to be used for bringing back slaves in return; but it was sufficient if there was a slave adventure, and the vessel was in any way engaged in that adventure. (q)

Evidence.

Where a party residing in London was charged with having chartered a vessel, and loaded goods on board, for the purpose of slave trading, it was held that slave trading papers found on board the vessel when she was seized off the coast of Africa, but not traced in any way to the knowledge of the prisoner, were not admissible in evidence against him. The recited Act and this Act shall apply to all British subjects, wherever residing.

The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 98, s. 1, recites sec. 2 of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, and enacts 'that all the provisions of the said consolidated Slave Trade Act hereinbefore recited and of this present Act shall, from and after the coming into operation of this Act, be deemed to extend and apply to British subjects wheresoever residing or being, and whether within the dominions of the British Crown or of any foreign country; and all the several matters and things prohibited by the said consolidated Slave Trade Act or by this present Act, when committed by British subjects, whether within the dominions of the British Crown or in any foreign country, except only as is hereinafter excepted, shall be deemed and taken to be offences committed against the said several Acts respectively, and shall be dealt with and punished accordingly: provided nevertheless, that nothing herein contained shall repeal or alter any of the provisions of the said Act.

Sec. 6. ' Nothing in this Act contained shall be taken to subject to any forfeiture, punishment, or penalty any person for transferring or receiving any share in any joint-stock company established before the passing of this Act in respect of any slave or slaves in the possession of such company before such time, or for selling any slave or slaves which were lawfully in his possession at the time of passing this Act, or which such persons shall or may have become possessed of or entitled unto bonâ fide prior to such sale, by inheritance, devise, bequest, marriage, or otherwise by operation of law.'

Act not to extend to persons obtaining slaves by inheritance, &c.

Sec. 4 provides for issuing a mandamus for the examination of witnesses, and the receiving other proofs concerning matters charged in any indictment or information in the Queen's Bench for offences against the Acts committed in any British colony, settlement, plantation, or territory.

There is nothing in the statutes to prohibit a contract by a British subject for the sale of slaves lawfully held by him in a foreign country, where the possession and sale of slaves is legal. Where therefore the defendants, British subjects, resident and domiciled in Great Britain, being possessed of certain slaves in the Brazils, where the purchase and holding of slaves is lawful, contracted with the plaintiff, a Brazilian subject, domiciled in the Brazils, to sell them to him, to be used and employed there, and some of the slaves had been purchased by the defendants in the Brazils after the passing of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, but before the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 98, for the purpose of being employed, and they were employed, in certain mines there, of which the defendants were the proprietors; and the rest of the slaves were their offspring, and were in the possession of the defendants before the passing of the latter Act; it was held that the contract was valid. (t)

A contract for the sale of slaves in a foreign country where the sale is lawful is not unlawful.

(s) The 9 Geo. 4, c. 31 is repealed; but there is no doubt that, for the purposes of this section, it would be held to be kept alive. See Reg. v. Merionethshire, 6 Q. B. 343. Reg. v. Breconshire, 15 Q. B. 813.

Nature of these offences.

EVERY practice or device by act, conspiracy, words, or news, to enhance the price of victuals or other merchandize, has been held to be unlawful; as being prejudicial to trade and commerce, and injurious to the public in general. (a) Practices of this kind came under the notion of forestalling; which anciently comprehended, in its signification, regrating and ingrossing, and all other offences of the like nature. (b) Spreading false rumours, buying things in the market before the accustomed hour, or buying and selling again the same thing in the same market, are offences of this kind. (c) Also if a person within the realm bought any merchandize in gross, and sold the same again in gross, it was considered an offence of this nature, on the ground that the price must be thereby enhanced, as each person through whose hands it passed would endeavour to make his profit of it. (d) So the bare ingrossing of a whole commodity, with an intent to sell it at an unreasonable price, was an offence at the common law; for if such practices were allowed, a rich man might ingross into his hands a whole commodity, and then sell it at what price he should think fit. (e)

The statutes on this subject now repealed.

7 & 8 Vict. c. 24. Offences of badgering, ingrossing, forestalling, and regrating, abolished.

Not to apply to false rumours, or by force or threats preventing goods

The offences of forestalling, regrating, and ingrossing were for a considerable period prohibited by statutes; but the beneficial tendency of such statutes was doubted; and at length by the 12 Geo. 3, c. 71, they were repealed, as being detrimental to the supply of the labouring and manufacturing poor of the kingdom. But forestalling, regrating, and ingrossing, continued offences at common law until the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, s. 1, which enacts that ‘the several offences of badgering, engrossing, forestalling, and regrating be utterly taken away and abolished, and that no information, indictment, suit, or prosecution, shall lie either at common law or by virtue of any statute, or be commenced or prosecuted against any person for or by reason of any of the said offences or supposed offences.’

Sec. 4. ‘Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to apply to the offence of knowingly and fraudulently spreading, or conspiring to spread, any false rumour, with intent to enhance or deery the price of any goods or merchandize, or to the offence of preventing, or endeavouring to prevent, by force or threats, any goods, wares, or merchandize being brought to any fair or market, but that every such offence may be inquired of, tried, and punished as if this Act had not been made.'

coming to fairs or markets.

The attempt by false reports to enhance or abate the price of our native commodities is punishable by fine and ransom at common law. (f) And where certain persons came to Coteswold, and said, in deceit of the people, that there were such wars beyond the seas that wool could not pass or be carried beyond sea, whereby the price of wools was abated; and presentment thereof being made, the defendants, having appeared, were, upon their confession, put to fine and ransom. (g) And there can be no doubt that the offences excepted by sec. 4 of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24 are punishable like other common law misdemeanors. (h)

Enhancing or decrying the price of goods how punishable.

Monopolies are much the same offence in other branches of trade that ingrossing is in provisions: being a license or privilege allowed by the King for the sole buying and selling, making, working, or using of anything whatsoever; whereby the subject in general is restrained from that liberty of manufacturing or trading which he had before. (i) They are said to differ only in this—that monopoly is by patent from the King, ingrossing by the act of the subject, between party and party; and have been considered as both equally injurious to trades and the freedom of the subject, and therefore equally restrained by the common law. (k) By the common law, therefore, those who are guilty of this offence are subject to fine and imprisonment, the offence being malum in se, and contrary to the ancient and fundamental laws of the kingdom; and it is said that there are precedents of prosecutions of this kind in former days. (l) And all grants of this kind, relating to any known trade, are void by the common law. (m)

Of monopolies.

But, notwithstanding their illegality, monopolies had been carried to an enormous height during the reign of Queen Elizabeth; the evil was, however, in a great measure remedied by the 21 Jac. 1, c. 3, which declares them to be contrary to law, and void (except as to patents not exceeding the grant of fourteen years to the authors of new inventions; and except also patents concerning printing, saltpetre, gunpowder, great ordnance, and shot); and monopolists are punished with the forfeiture of treble damages and double costs to those whom they attempt to disturb. CHAPTER THE TWENTIETH.

OF MAINTENANCE AND CHAMPERTY, AND OF BUYING AND SELLING PRETENDED TITLES.

Maintenance.

1. MAINTENANCE seems to signify an unlawful taking in hand or upholding of quarrels or sides, to the disturbance or hindrance of common right. This may be where a person assists another in his pretensions to lands, by taking or holding the possession of them for him by force or subtilty, or where a person stirs up quarrels and suits in relation to matters wherein he is in no way concerned; (a) or it may be where a person officiously intermeddles in a suit depending in a court of justice, and in no way belonging to him, by assisting either party with money, or otherwise, in the prosecution or defence of such suit. (b) Where there is no contract to have part of the thing in suit, the party so intermeddling is said to be guilty of maintenance generally; but if the party stipulate to have part of the thing in suit, his offence is called champerty. (c)

Instances of maintenance.

As to maintenance, it is laid down that whoever assists another with money to carry on his cause, as by retaining one to be of counsel for him, or otherwise bearing him out in the whole or part of the expense of the suit, may properly be said to be guilty of an act of maintenance. (d) It has been said that no one can be guilty of maintenance in respect of any money given by him to another for the purposes of an intended suit, before any suit is actually commenced; but it should seem that this, if not strictly maintenance, must be equally criminal at common law. (e) And a person may be as much guilty of maintenance for supporting

(a) Co. Lit. 368 b. 2 Inst. 208, 212, 213. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83, s. 1, 2. Bac. Abr. tit. Maintenance. This kind of maintenance is called in the books ruralis, in distinction to another sort carried on in courts of justice, and therefore called curialis. It is punishable at the King's suit by fine and imprisonment, whether the matter in dispute any way depended in plea or not; but is said not to be actionable.

(b) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83, s. 3. Bac. Abr. tit. Maintenance. 4 Blac. Com. 134. This kind of maintenance is called curialis. See ante, note (a).

(c) Co. Lit. 368. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83, s. 3. The abuse of legal proceedings by oppressive combinations to carry them into effect is observed by Mr. Hume to have speedily appeared upon the establishment of the laws in the time of Edward I. He says, 'instead of their former associations for robbery and violence, men entered into formal combinations to support each other in law suits; and it was found requisite to check this iniquity by Act of Parliament.' 2 Hume, 320, referring to the statute of conspirators.—Edw. I.

(d) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83, s. 4, and the numerous authorities cited in the margin.

(e) Bac. Abr. tit. Maintenance (A). 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83, s. 12, where it is said, that if it plainly appear that the money was given merely with a design to assist in the prosecution or defence of an intended suit, which afterwards is actually brought, surely it cannot but be as great a misdemeanor in the nature of the thing and equally criminal at common law as if the money were given after the commencement of the suit; though perhaps it may not in strictness come under the notion of maintenance.

another after judgment, as for doing it while the plea is pending, because the party grieved may be thereby discouraged from bringing a writ of error or attain. (f) [176]

It has also been said, that he who by his friendship or interest saves a person that expense in his cause which he might otherwise be put to, or gives, or but endeavours to give, any other kind of assistance to a party in the management of his suit, is guilty of maintenance. (g) And it has been said also, that he who gives any public countenance to another in relation to such suit will come under the like notion; as if a person of great power and interest says publicly that he will spend a sum of money on one side, or that he will give a sum of money to labour the jury, whether in truth he spend anything or not; or where such a person comes to the bar with one of the parties, and stands by him while his cause is tried, whether he says anything or not; for such practices not only tend to discourage the other party from going on with his cause, but also to intimidate juries from doing their duty. (h) But it seems that a bare promise to maintain another is not in itself maintenance, unless it be either in respect of the power of the person who makes it, or of the public manner in which it is made. (i) And it seems clear, that a man is in no danger of being guilty of an act of maintenance, by giving another friendly advice as to his proper remedy at law, or as to the counsellor or attorney likely to do his business most effectually. (k)

But there are many acts, in the nature of maintenance, which become justifiable from the circumstances under which they are done. They may be justifiable—1, in respect of an interest in the (f) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83, s. 13. Bac. Abr. tit. Maintenance (A). Where a declaration alleged that the defendant unlawfully, maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, and without having any interest in the suit therein mentioned, instigated and stirred up a pauper to commence and prosecute an action against the plaintiff; by reason whereof the pauper did commence and prosecute such action, whereby the plaintiff was put to great trouble and vexation, and obliged to lay out a large sum in the defence of such action; the Court of Exchequer held that the declaration was good. Pechell v. Watson, 8 M. & W. 691. But where a declaration alleged that the defendant unlawfully and maliciously did procure, instigate, and stir up one Thomas to commence and prosecute an action against the plaintiff, wherein certain issues were joined as to which the plaintiff was acquitted; the Court of Queen's Bench held that no cause of action appeared, the declaration not showing maintenance (as the action appeared not to have been commenced when the defendant interfered), and not alleging want of reasonable and probable cause for the action.

Leman, 4 Q. B. 883. A declaration for maintenance need not charge the maintenance to have been committed against the form of the statute — it being a wrongful act at common law, and the statutes relating to maintenance being only declaratory of the common law with additional penalties. Nor need the declaration allege that the defendant was not interested in the action maintained; for if he was that is matter to be pleaded by him. Pechell v. Watson, supra.

Miller*, 4 T. R. 340, where he says, 'It is curious, and not altogether useless, to see how the doctrine of maintenance has from time to time been received in Westminster Hall. At one time, not only he who laid out money to assist another in his cause, but he that by his friendship or interest saved him an expense that he would otherwise be put to, was held guilty of maintenance. Nay, if he officiously gave evidence, it was maintenance; so that he must have had a subpoena, or suppressed the truth. That such doctrine, repugnant to every honest feeling of the human heart, should be laid aside, must be expected.'

thing in variance; 2, in respect of kindred or affinity; 3, in respect of other relations, as that of lord and tenant, master and servant; 4, in respect of charity; 5, in respect of the profession of the law.

In respect of an interest in the thing in variance.

It seems clear that not only those who have an actual interest in the thing in variance, as those who have a reversion expectant on an estate-tail, or a lease for life or years, &c., but also those who have a bare contingency of an interest in the lands in question, which possibly may never come in esse, and even those who by the act of God have the immediate possibility of such an interest, as heirs apparent, or the husbands of such heirs, though it be in the power of others to bar them, may lawfully maintain another in an action concerning such lands: and if a plaintiff in an action of trespass alien the lands, the alienee may produce evidence to prove that the inheritance at the time of the action was in the plaintiff, because the title is now become his own. (l) Also he who is bound to warrant lands may lawfully maintain the tenant in the defence of his title, because he is bound to render other lands to the value of those that shall be evicted. And he who has an equitable interest in lands or goods, or even in a chose in action, as a cestui que trust, or a vendee of lands, &c., or an assignee of a bond for a good consideration, may lawfully maintain a suit concerning the thing in which he has such an equity. (m) And wherever any persons claim a common interest in the same thing, as in a way, churchyard, or common, &c., by the same title, they may maintain one another in a suit concerning such thing. And a man's bail may take care to have his appearance recorded: but, as some say, they cannot safely intermeddle further. (n)

Agreement by persons interested in supporting moduses to resist suits for tithes is valid.

Where, on the trial of an action brought to recover the amount of an attorney's bill, in which there was a plea of maintenance, it appeared that Jesus College, Oxford, had given notice to set out tithes in kind to all the owners of old inclosures in the parish of Tredington, who had, as far as living memory went, paid certain sums of money in lieu of tithes for the old inclosures, and that at a meeting of the owners of such old inclosures, it was agreed by them that they should defend any suit or suits, which should be instituted by Jesus College, to enforce the payment of tithes, and that the expenses of such defence should be paid by the owners in proportion to their interests, as ascertained by the poor rate; the owners considering that if Jesus College should succeed in one suit as to any part of the old inclosures, that would invalidate the payments as to all; and Jesus College afterwards filed seven bills in the Exchequer, and commissions were issued for the examination of witnesses in each suit, and depositions taken in all the suits; but in one suit a greater number of depositions than in any other, and which related to there having been no payment of any tithe for the old inclosures, and there being a distinction in this respect, as far as living memory went, between the old and the new inclosures: and these depositions by consent had been used in all the suits; and nine issues having been directed to be tried, and the jury having retired to consider their verdict in the first, it was agreed that the verdicts in the other issues should be entered according to the finding of the jury in the first; but such jury was discharged without finding any verdict, and decrees were afterwards made, establishing some of the moduses and quashing others; it was held that the agreement to defend the suits was not maintenance; for, although the payments were not the same per acre, and although the interest in each payment was separate, yet all the owners of the old inclosures had an interest in supporting the moduses over all the old inclosures, and, consequently, the agreement was not officiously entered into in order to defend the suits. (o)

Where a count stated that Yeoman had deposited certain money in the hands of the plaintiff, which the plaintiff had delivered to the defendant at his request, and that Yeoman threatened to bring an action against the plaintiff to recover the money, and thereupon, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, would defend any action Yeoman should commence, the defendant undertook to save the plaintiff harmless; that Yeoman brought an action to recover the money, and that the plaintiff defended it with the privity and consent of the defendant; it was held that this was not maintenance. (p)

Whoever is of kin, or godfather to either of the parties, or related by any kind of affinity still continuing, may lawfully stand by at the bar and counsel him, and pray another to be of counsel for him; but cannot lawfully lay out his money in the cause, unless he be either father, or son, or heir-apparent, to the party, or husband of such an heiress. (q)

In respect of kindred or affinity.

Much of the law relating to the maintenance which a lord may give to his tenant would hardly be applicable at the present time. It seems to have been the better opinion that the lord might justify laying out his own money in defence of his tenant's title, where the lands were originally derived from the lord, but that he could not maintain the tenant in respect of lands not holden of himself. (r)

In respect of the relation of lord and tenant, master and servant.

With respect to the maintenance which a master may give to his servant, it has been held that he may go along with him, or his domestic chaplain, to retain counsel; also he may pray one to be of counsel for him, and may go with him, and stand with him, and aid him at the trial, but ought not to speak in Court in favour of his cause: also it is said, that if the servant be arrested, the master may assist him with money to keep him from prison, that he may have the benefit of his service; but he cannot safely lay out money for the servant in a real action, unless he have some of his wages in his hands; but those, with the servant's consent, he may safely disburse. (s) And a servant cannot lawfully lay out any of his own money to assist the master in his suit. (t)

Anyone may lawfully give money to a poor man to enable him to carry on his suit: and anyone may safely go with a foreigner, [178] who cannot speak English, to a counsellor and inform him of his case. (u)

In respect of the profession of the law.

A counsellor, having received his fee, may lawfully set forth his client's cause to the best advantage; but can no more justify giving him money to maintain his suit, or threatening a juror, than any other person. An attorney, also, when specially retained, may lawfully prosecute or defend an action, and lay out his own money in the suit; but an attorney who maintains another is not justified by a general retainer to prosecute for him in all causes. Nor can an attorney lawfully carry on a cause for another at his own expense, with a promise never to expect repayment; and it is said to be questionable whether solicitors, who are no attorneys, can, in any case, lawfully lay out their own money in another's cause. (v)

A purchase by an attorney managing a cause of the fruits of the verdict is illegal, though he be not the attorney on the record.

Where there was one attorney on the record, and another attorney became before the trial really and substantially the attorney for the client in the conduct of the suit, and the latter after verdict, but before judgment, bonâ fide purchased from his client the benefit of his verdict, it was held that the transaction, being a purchase of the subject matter of the suit by the attorney, was void; for the attorney was to be considered as the attorney having the management of the cause, and the purchase was in effect a purchase by the attorney in the cause of the subject matter of it pendente lite, not for the purpose of enabling them to carry on the suit, but because they wanted money; and independently of the statutes restraining the purchase of property in suit, it had been held, in several cases, that no attorney can be permitted to purchase anything in litigation, of which litigation he has the management. (w)

A contract by an attorney to receive a sum above his costs from his client is illegal.

A contract whereby an attorney stipulates with a client to receive, in consideration of the large advances requisite to conducting the proceedings to a successful issue, over and above his legal costs, a sum which should be commensurate with his outlay and exertions and with the benefit resulting to the client, is unlawful. The contract would have been directly in violation of the laws against maintenance, if the stipulation had been that the plaintiff, as attorney in the suit, in consideration of his advancing the funds necessary for carrying on the litigation, should receive a portion of the proceeds or property to be recovered; and the only difference between the two cases is that, in the former, the party would have the security of the property; whereas here he has only the personal security of the client. But if he be a solvent man, he gets a share of the property by another mode, viz., by suing him and obtaining judgment. (x)

An assignment of the subject matter of a suit as a security for

But there is a clear distinction between the assignment by a client to an attorney of the subject matter of a suit by way of security, and an absolute sale of the subject matter of the suit. In the latter case the attorney might have an opportunity of imposing on his client, from his superior knowledge of the value of that subject matter, and might after the purchase take improper means to increase the value. But a mere assignment, by way of security, is open to no such danger, and may be very advantageous to the client. (y) Where therefore, a client having recovered a verdict in an ejectment, by an indenture, reciting that he was indebted to his attorney in £100 for money lent and for work done as an attorney, and was unable to pay it, and had agreed to secure it, granted the crop of potatoes then growing upon the close, which was the subject of the action, and all other effects thereon, until payment of the £100 and interest, with a proviso that if the client paid the £100 and the interest on a certain day, the indenture should be void; and the indenture also contained a power to the attorney, on default of payment, to enter, carry away, and dispose of the effects assigned; provided that, if he sold the property, he should hold the surplus, after paying the expenses and reimbursing himself, in trust for the client; it was held that this deed could not be impeached on the ground of either champerty or maintenance. (z) costs may be valid.

But no counsellor or attorney can justify using any deceitful practice in maintenance of a client's cause: and they will be liable to be punished for misdemeanors in this respect by the common law, and also by the statute of Westm. 1, c. 29. (a) In the construction of this statute it hath been holden that all fraud and falsehood, tending to impose upon or abuse the justice of the King's courts, are within the purview of it; as if an attorney sue out an habere facias seisinam, falsely reciting a recovery where there was none, and by colour thereof put the supposed tenant in the action out of his freehold. Also it is an offence within the statute to bring a præcipe against a poor man having nothing in the land, on purpose to oust the true tenant, or to procure an attorney to appear for a man, and confess a judgment without any warrant; or to plead a false plea, known to be utterly groundless, and invented merely to delay justice and to abuse the Court. (b) In most of these cases the Court would probably grant an attachment against the offender on motion. (c)

2. Champerty is a species of maintenance, being a bargain with a plaintiff or defendant campum partire, to divide the land or other matter sued for between them, if they prevail at law; whereupon the champertor is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense. (d) It is defined in the old books to be, the unlawful maintenance of a suit, in consideration of some bargain to have part of the thing in dispute, or some profit out of it (e)

The statute of Westminster 1 (3 Edw. 1), c. 25, enacts, that ‘no officers of the King, by themselves nor by others, shall maintain pleas, suits, or matters, hanging in the King’s courts, for lands, tenements, or other things, for to have part or profit thereof, by covenant made between them; and he that doth shall be punished at the King’s pleasure.’ By the Courts mentioned in this statute it has been held that courts of record only are intended; and it has also been held that under the word covenant all kinds of promises and contracts of this kind are included; that maintenance in personal actions, to have part of the debt or damages, is as much within the statute as maintenance in real actions for a part of the land; and that though a grant of rent out of other lands is not within the statute, yet the statute applies to a grant of rent out of the lands in question; but that a grant of part of a thing in suit, made in consideration of a precedent debt, is not within its meaning. (f) The maintenance of a tenant or defendant is as much within the meaning of the statute as the maintenance of a demandant or plaintiff. And it has been holden not to be material whether he who brings a writ of champerty did in truth suffer any damage by it, or whether the plea wherein it is alleged be determined or not. (g)

The statute of Westminster 2 (13 Edw. 1), c. 49, enacts, that ‘the chancellor, treasurer, justices, nor any of the King’s council, no clerk of the chancery, nor of the exchequer, nor of any justice or other officer, nor any of the King’s house, clerk ne lay, shall not receive any church, nor advowson of a church, land, nor tene-ment, in fee, by gift, nor by purchase, nor to farm, nor by champerty, nor otherwise, so long as the thing is in plea before us, or before any of our officers; nor shall take no reward thereof. And he that doth contrary to this Act, either himself or by another, or make any bargain, shall be punished at the King’s pleasure, as well he that purchaseth as he that doth sell.’ This statute extends only to the officers therein named, and not to any other persons. (h) But it so strictly restrains all such officers from purchasing any land, pending a plea, that they cannot be excused by a consideration of kindred or affinity, and they are within the meaning of the statute by barely making such a purchase, whether they maintain the party in his suit or not; whereas such a purchase for good consideration made by any other person, of any terre-tenant, is no offence, unless it appear that he did it to maintain the party. The 28 Edw. 1, c. 11, reciting that the King had theretofore ordained by statute that none of his ministers should take no plea for maintenance, by which statute other officers were not bounded, enacts, that ‘the King will that no officer, nor any other (for to have part of the thing in plea) shall not take upon him the business that is in suit; nor none upon any such covenant shall give up his right to another; and if any do, and he be attainted thereof, the taker shall forfeit unto the King so much of his lands and goods as doth amount to the value of the part that he hath purchased for such maintenance. ever will shall be received to sue for the King before the justices before whom the plea hangeth, and the judgment shall be given by them. But it may not be understood hereby, that any person shall be prohibit to have counsel of pleaders, or of learned men in the law for his fee, or of his parents or next friends.' Upon this statute it seems to be agreed that champerty in any action at law is within it; and a purchase of land, pending a suit in equity concerning it, has also been holden to be within the statute; also a lease for life or years, or a voluntary gift of land, pending a plea, is as much within the statute as a purchase for money. But neither a conveyance executed, pending a plea, in pursuance of a precedent bargain, nor any surrender by a lessee to his lessor, nor any conveyance or promise thereof made by a father to his son, or by any ancestor to his heir apparent, nor a gift of land in suit, after the end of it, to a counsellor, for his fee or wages, without any kind of precedent bargain relating to such gift, are within the meaning of the statute. (h) A bargain by a man, who has evidence in his own possession respecting a matter in dispute between third persons, and who at the time professes to have the means of procuring more evidence, to purchase from one of the contending parties, as the price of the evidence which he so possesses or can procure, an eighth part or share of the sum of money, which shall be recovered by means of the production of that evidence, is an illegal agreement; and if there be any difference between such a contract, and direct champerty, it is strongly against the legality of such contract; as besides the ordinary objection, that a stranger to the controversy has acquired an interest to carry on the litigation to the uttermost extent, by every influence and means in his power, the bargain to furnish and to procure evidence for the consideration of a money payment in proportion to the effect produced by such evidence, has a direct tendency to pervert the course of justice. (l) So where a bill was filed for the purpose, amongst other things of declaring an agreement void, which had been made by a seaman for the sale of his chance of prize money to his prize agents, who were to carry on the suit, Sir W. Grant, M. R., expressed an opinion that the agreement was void, as amounting to champerty. (m)

Where to a declaration upon an agreement the defendant pleaded that one Townley died possessed of personal property, intestate and without any known relation, and that administration had been granted to the Solicitor to the Treasury for the use of the Queen, and that the defendant was ignorant of his being related to Townley, or in any way entitled to the property, and that the plaintiff and one Rosaz represented to the defendant that they would supply and give such information and evidence, in case it should be necessary that proceedings should be taken by the defendant at law or in equity for the recovery of the property, that, by means of such information and evidence, the defendant should and might recover the property, provided the defendant would enter into an agreement with the plaintiff and Rosaz to pay each of them one-fifth of the property so recovered; and that it was thereupon unlawfully agreed between the parties that the plaintiff and Rosaz should give and supply such information and evidence in case of proceedings being taken at law or in equity for recovery of the property, that, by means of such information and evidence the defendant should successfully recover the property; and that if by means of such information and evidence the defendant should actually recover the property, he would pay each of them one-fifth of the amount; and that for the purpose of carrying this illegal agreement into effect the parties entered into the agreement set out in the declaration, and that it was under the illegal agreement that the property was actually recovered; it was held that this was maintenance in its worst aspect. The plaintiff and Rosaz, entire strangers to the property, which they say the defendant has a title to, but which is in the possession of another claiming title to it, agree with the defendant that legal proceedings shall be instituted in his name for the recovery of it, and that they will supply him, not with any specified or definite documents or information, but with evidence that shall be sufficient to enable him successfully to recover the property; each of them is to have one-fifth of the property when so recovered; and unless the evidence with which they supply him is sufficient for this purpose, they are to have nothing. They are not to employ the attorney or to advance money to carry on the litigation; but they are to supply that upon which the event of the suit must depend, evidence; and they are to supply it of such a nature and in such quantity as to secure success. The plaintiff purchases an interest in the property in dispute, bargains for litigation to recover it, and undertakes to maintain the defendant in the suit in a manner of all others the most likely to lead to perjury and to a perversion of justice. Upon principle such an agreement is clearly illegal, and Stanley v. Jones (o) is an express authority to that effect. (p)

tended title

3. Another species of maintenance appears to be the offence of buying or selling a pretended title; of which it is said in the books that it seems to be a high offence at common law, as plainly tending to oppression, for a man to buy or sell at an under rate a doubtful title to lands known to be disputed, to the intent that the buyer may carry on the suit, which the seller does not think it worth his while to do. And it seems not to be material whether the title be good or bad; or whether the seller were in possession or not, unless the possession were lawful and uncontested. (q) Offences of this kind are also restrained by several statutes. The 1 Rich. 2, c. 9, enacts, that no gift or feoffment of lands or goods in debate under legal proceedings, as mentioned in the statute, shall be made; and that, if made, they shall be holden for none and of no value. (r) And by the 13 Edw. 1, c. 49, no person of the King's house shall buy any title whilst the thing is in dispute, on pain of both the buyer and seller being punished at the King's pleasure. There is also a provision of the 32 Hen. 8, c. 9, that no one shall buy or sell, or obtain any pretended right or title to land, unless the seller, his ancestors, or they by whom he claims, have been in possession of the same, or of the reversion or remainder thereof, or taken the rents or profits for one whole year before, on pain that both seller and buyer shall each forfeit the value of such land, the one-half to the King, and the other to him who will sue. (s)

The offences of champerty and buying of titles, laid or alleged in any declaration or information, may be laid in any county, at the pleasure of the informer. (t)

Place of trial for champerty and buying of titles.

By the common law all unlawful maintainers are not only liable to render damages in an action at the suit of the party grieved, but may also be indicted and fined, and imprisoned, &c.; and it seems that a court of record may commit a man for an act of maintenance in the face of the Court. (u)

Punishment of maintenance by common law.

Some pains and penalties are also attached to this offence by statute. The 1 Rich. 2, c. 4, enacts, that no person whatsoever shall take or sustain any quarrel by maintenance, in the country or elsewhere, on grievous pain; that is to say, the King's counsellors and great officers, on a pain that shall be ordained by the King himself, by the advice of the lords of this realm; and other officers of the King, on pain to lose their offices and to be imprisoned and ransomed, &c.; and all other persons, on pain of imprisonment and ransom. And by the 32 Hen. 8, c. 9, maintenance is subjected to a forfeiture of ten pounds: one moiety to the King, and the other moiety to the informer. (v)

By statute.

(s) But the statute provides that any person, being in lawful possession by taking the rents and profits, may buy or get the pretended right or title of any other person to the same. And it also provides, that no person shall be charged with these penalties unless sued within a year after the offence. For the construction of this statute, see 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 86, s. 7, et seq.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIRST.

OF EMBRACERY, AND DISSUADING A WITNESS FROM GIVING EVIDENCE.

Embracery—Corrupting or influencing

EMBRACERY is another species of maintenance, and consists in such practices as tend to affect the administration of justice by improperly working upon the minds of jurors. It seems clear that any attempt whatsoever to corrupt or influence, or instruct a jury in the cause beforehand, or in any way to incline them to be more favourable to the one side than to the other, by money, promises, letters, threats, or persuasions, except only by the strength of the evidence and the arguments of the counsel in open Court, at the trial of the cause, is a proper act of embracery, whether the jurors on whom such attempt is made give any verdict or not, or whether the verdict given be true or false. (a) And it has been adjudged that the bare giving of money to another, to be distributed among jurors, is an offence of the nature of embracery, whether any of it be afterwards actually so distributed or not. It is also clear that it is as criminal in a juror as in any other person to endeavour to prevail with his companions to give a verdict for one side by any practices whatsoever; except only by arguments from the evidence which may have been produced, and exhortations from the general obligations of conscience to give a true verdict. And there can be no doubt but that all fraudulent contrivances whatsoever to secure a verdict are high offences of this nature; as where persons by indirect means procure themselves or others to be sworn on a tales in order to serve one side. (b)

It is said that generally the giving of money to a juror after the verdict, without any precedent contract in relation to it, is an offence savouring of the nature of embracery; but this does not apply to the reasonable recompense usually allowed to jurors for their expenses in travelling. (c)

How far justifiable.

The law will not suffer a mere stranger so much as to labour a juror to appear, and act according to his conscience; but it seems clear that a person who may justify any other act of maintenance, (d) may safely labour a juror to appear and give a verdict according to his conscience; but that no other person can justify intermeddling so far. And no one whatsoever can justify the labouring a juror not to appear. (e)

other kinds of unlawful maintenance do by the common law. (f) They are also restrained by statutes; the 5 Edw. 3, c. 10, enacting, that any juror taking of the one party or the other, and being duly attainted, shall not be put in any assizes, juries, or inquests, and shall be commanded to prison, and further ransomed at the King's will; and the 34 Edw. 3, c. 8, enacting, that a juror attainted of such offence shall be imprisoned for a year. The 38 Edw. 3, c. 12, enacts, that if any jurors, sworn in assizes and other inquests, take anything, and be thereof attainted, every such juror shall pay ten times as much as he hath taken. 'And that all the embracers to bring or procure such inquest in the country, to take gain or profit, shall be punished in the same manner and form as the jurors; and if the juror or embracer so attainted have not whereof to make gree in the manner aforesaid, he shall have the imprisonment of one year.' (g) The 32 Hen. 8, c. 9, enacts, that no person shall embrace any freeholders or jurors upon pain of forfeiting ten pounds, half to the King, and half to him that shall sue within a year.

The 6 Geo. 4, c. 50, s. 62, repeals so much of the 5 Edw. 3, c. 10, 'as relates to the punishment of a corrupt juror,' and so much of the 34 Edw. 3, c. 8, 'as directs the proceedings against jurors taking a reward to give their verdict;' and so much of the 38 Edw. 3, c. 12, 'as ordains the penalty on corrupt jurors and embracers,' and enacts and declares, by sec. 61, that 'notwithstanding anything herein contained, every person who shall be guilty of the offence of embracery, and every juror who shall wilfully or corruptly consent thereto, shall and may be respectively proceeded against by indictment or information, and be punished by fine and imprisonment, in like manner as every such person might have been before the passing of this Act.'

Embracers and corrupt jurors punishable by fine and imprisonment.

All who endeavour to stifle the truth, and prevent the due execution of justice, are highly punishable; and therefore the dissuading or endeavouring to dissuade a witness from giving evidence against a person indicted is an offence at common law, though the persuasion should not succeed. (h)

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SECOND.

OF BARRATRY, AND OF SUING IN THE NAME OF A FICTITIOUS PLAINTIFF.

[184]

Definition of barratry.

What persons may commit the offence.

A BARRATOR is defined to be a common mover, exciter, or maintainer of suits or quarrels, in courts of record, or other courts, as the county court, and the like; or in the country, by taking and keeping possession of lands in controversy, by all kinds of disturbance of the peace, or by spreading false rumours and calumnies whereby discord and disquiet may grow among neighbours. (a) But one act of this description will not make anyone a barrator, as it is necessary in an indictment for this offence to charge the defendant with being a common barrator, which is a term of art appropriated by law to this crime. (b) It has been holden, that a man shall not be adjudged a barrator in respect of any number of false actions brought by him in his own right; (c) but this is doubted, in case such actions be merely groundless and vexatious, without any manner of colour, and brought only with a design to oppress the defendants. (d)

An attorney cannot be deemed a barrator in respect of his maintaining another in a groundless action, to the commencing whereof he was in no way privy. (e) And it seems to have been holden that a feme covert cannot be indicted as a common barrator; (f) but this opinion is considered as questionable. (g)

Indictment and proceedings.

In an indictment for this offence it seems to be unnecessary to allege it to have been committed at any certain place; because, from the nature of the crime, consisting in the repetition of several acts, it must be intended to have happened in several places; wherefore it is said that the trial ought to be by a jury from the body of the county. (h) As the indictment may be in a general form, stating the defendant to be a common barrator, without showing any particular facts, it is clearly settled that the prosecutor must, before the trial, give the defendant a note of the particular acts of barratry which he intends to prove against him; and that, if he omit to do so, the Court will not suffer him to proceed in the trial of the indictment. (i) And the prosecutor will be confined

It has been adjudged that justices of peace, as such, have, by virtue of the commission of the peace, authority to inquire and hear this offence, without any special commission of oyer and terminer. (l)

Trial may be before justices of the peace.

The punishment for this offence in common persons is by fine and imprisonment, and binding them to their good behaviour; and in persons of any profession relating to the law, a further punishment by being disabled to practise for the future. (m) And it may be observed, that by 12 Geo. 1, c. 29, s. 4, if any person convicted of common barratry shall practise as an attorney, solicitor, or agent, in any suit or action in England, the judge or judges of the Court where such suit or action shall be brought shall, upon complaint or information, examine the matter in a summary way in open Court; and, if it shall appear that the person complained of has offended, shall cause such offender to be transported for seven years. (n)

Punishment.

In this place may be mentioned another offence of equal malignity and audaciousness; that of suing another in the name of a fictitious plaintiff; either one not in being at all, or one who is ignorant of the suit. This offence, if committed in any of the King's superior Courts, is left, as a high contempt, to be punished at their discretion: but in Courts of a lower degree, where the crime is equally pernicious, but the authority of the judges not equally extensive, it is directed by the 8 Eliz. c. 2, s. 4, to be punished by six months' imprisonment, and treble damages to the party injured. CHAPTER THE TWENTY-THIRD.

OF BIGAMY.

[186] THE offence of having a plurality of wives at the same time is more correctly denominated polygamy: but, the name bigamy having been more frequently given to it in legal proceedings, it may perhaps be a means of more ready reference to treat of the offence under the latter title. (a) Originally this offence was considered as of ecclesiastical cognizance only; and though the 4 Edw. 1, stat. 3, c. 5, treated it as a capital crime, it appears still to have been left of doubtful temporal cognizance, until the 1 Jac. 1, c. 11, declared that such offence should be felony.

The provisions of this statute were in several respects defective. A person whose consort had been abroad for seven years, though known to be living, might have married again with impunity. And so might a person who was only divorced a mensâ et thoro. The 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, therefore repealed the statute of James, and that Act is repealed by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95: and by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, 'Whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether the second marriage shall have taken place in England or Ireland or elsewhere, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, (b) and any such offence may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in any county or place in England or Ireland where the offender shall be apprehended or be in custody, in the same manner in all respects as if the offence had been actually committed in that county or place. Provided that nothing in this section contained shall extend to any second marriage contracted elsewhere than in England and Ireland by any other than a subject of Her Majesty, or to any person marrying a second time whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time, or shall extend to any person who, at the time of such second marriage, shall have been divorced from the bond of the first marriage, or to any person whose former marriage shall have been declared void by the sentence of any Court of competent jurisdiction.' (c)

(a) Bigamy, in its proper signification, is said to mean only being twice married, and not having a plurality of wives at once. According to the canonists, bigamy consisted in marrying two virgins successively, one after the death of the other; or in once marrying a widow. 4 Blac.

Com. 163, note b. And see Bac. Abr. tit. Bigamy, in the notes.

(b) As to principals in the second degree, accessories, and hard labour, &c. See ante, pp. 4, 5.

(c) This clause is taken from the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 22, and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 26 (1.)

Bigamy.

Offence may be dealt with where offender shall be apprehended.

Not to extend to second marriages, &c. herein stated.

It was held under the 1 Jac. 1, that if a woman married a husband in Ireland, and afterwards, such husband still living, married another husband in England, it was within the Act. But that if she married a husband in England, and afterwards, such husband still living, married another husband in Ireland, it was not within the Act: on the ground that the second marriage, which alone constituted the offence, was a fact done within another jurisdiction; and, though inquirable here for some purposes, like all transitory acts, was not cognizable as a crime by the rule of the common law; (d) but the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, makes the second marriage whether 'in England or elsewhere,' bigamy; and so did the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31; so that where the prisoner, a subject of her Majesty, usually resident at Carlisle, married in Scotland, and according to the law of Scotland, Anne Ashton, also in like manner resident in Carlisle, and afterwards, whilst the said Anne was alive, the prisoner, who continued resident at Carlisle, married in Scotland, according to the law of Scotland, Jane Lister, also usually resident in Carlisle; it was held that he was guilty of bigamy under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 22; for at the time of his second marriage he was a person married, and the second marriage, although it took place in Scotland, was clearly an offence within the statute. (e) In another case it was ruled, that if A. takes B. to husband in Holland, and then, in Holland, takes C. to husband living B., and then B. dies, and then A. living C. marries D., this is not marrying a second husband, the former being alive; the marriage to C. living B. being simply void. But if B. had been living, it would have been felony to have married D. in England. (f)

The proviso in the new statute contains exceptions in respect of four cases, in which a second marriage is no felony within the statute.

The first exception is that the statute shall not extend 'to any second marriage contracted elsewhere than in England and Ireland by any other than a subject of her Majesty.'

The second exception is that it shall not extend to 'any person marrying a second time, whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time.' Here, by the express words of the clause, the party marrying again must have no knowledge of the former husband or wife having been alive; and it does away with the absurd construction put upon the first exception in the 1 Jac. 1, that if the husband or wife were abroad for seven years, it was no offence, though the party remaining in England knew that the other was living. (g) But the obligation of a party to use reasonable diligence to inform himself of the fact, and the question whether if he neglect or refuse to avail himself of palpable means of acquiring such information, he will stand excused, are points which do not appear to be settled. (h) Where the first marriage was in 1824, and the parties separated in 1827, and did not again live together, and the second marriage was in 1840, and there was evidence that the prisoner and his first wife were walking together in 1834; Patteson, J., held that the true construction of the proviso was, not that the party must know, at the time when he contracts the second marriage, that the first wife has been alive during the seven years, but that he must have been ignorant during the whole of those seven years that she was alive. If it had been meant that he should not, 'at the time of such second marriage,' know that the first wife was alive, those words would have been used. (i) And where the first wife left the prisoner sixteen years before his second marriage, and the second wife had known the prisoner about ten years, living in service as a single man, and never knew or heard that he had had a wife, and the first wife had lived seventeen miles from the place where the prisoner lived; Cresswell, J., held that the prisoner came within the proviso, as there was no proof that the prisoner knew that his first wife was living. (k)

Upon an indictment for bigamy the first marriage was with J. Briggs in 1844, at Altonbury; the second in 1856, at Cambridge. The prisoner on both occasions was married by her maiden name, and the second husband swore that she had represented herself to him as a single woman. Altonbury and Cambridge are about twenty-four miles apart. J. Briggs was a labouring man, considerably older than the prisoner, living in lodgings, and working at a farm about two miles from Altonbury, sometimes absent from it for a month at a time. A witness said that the prisoner left him at the end of four months from the marriage, and he had not seen her subsequently. The jury were asked whether in their opinion the prisoner knew her husband to be alive at the time she contracted the second marriage; and if not, whether she had the means of acquiring the knowledge; and were directed that, even if they thought her ignorant in fact of her husband's being alive, still to find her guilty, if they also thought that by the exercise of reasonable diligence, in making enquiry, she might have informed herself, and neglected to use such diligence. The jury said they had no evidence of her knowledge; but were of opinion that she had the means of acquiring knowledge, if she had chosen to make use of them; and, upon a case reserved after a verdict of guilty, it was held that the conviction was wrong; for the verdict was imperfect, as the jury had not found that the prisoner knew her husband was alive. (l)

(i) Reg. v. Cullen, 9 C. & P. 681. The jury found that the prisoner and his wife were walking together in 1834. If they had found otherwise, Patteson, J., would have reserved the question whether the prisoner was bound to prove that he had made due enquiries as to his first wife being alive when he was married a second time.

(k) Reg. v. Jones, C. & M. 614.

(l) Reg. v. Briggs, A. D. 1856, D. & B. C. C. 98. The case was argued only on the part of the prisoner, and the Court studiously avoided determining on which side the onus of proof as to the knowledge of the first husband being alive lay, and yet the point seems very clear. It is plain that the latter part of the section both in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 22, and in the new Act is in the nature of a proviso. Now no rule is better settled than that if an exception comes by way of proviso, whether it occurs in a subsequent part of the Act, or in a subsequent part of the same section containing the enactment of the offence, it must be specially pleaded as an answer where it is necessary to plead the defence, or proved in evidence by the party relying upon it. Simpson v. Ready, 12 M. & W. 736. Steel v. Smith, 1 B. & A. 94. 1 Stark. Ev. 365 (2nd edit.) citing

Where the prisoner married in 1838, and in 1843 separated from his wife, and again married in 1855, and in 1857 the prisoner produced his first wife in order to protect his second wife from a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretences, and some of the prisoner's family proved that for sixteen years prior to 1857 they had heard nothing of the prisoner's first wife; and the preceding case was cited; Cockburn, C. J., left it to the jury whether there was any reasonable doubt that there was an absence of all knowledge on the prisoner's part that his wife was alive, and if they were of that opinion he was entitled to be acquitted. (m)

Where the parties had lived together for two or three years after their marriage in 1846, and then separated on the ground of the adultery of the wife; and the prisoner married his second wife in 1857, and before he married her told her he had been married before, and had left his first wife eight years ago on the ground of adultery, and that he had been told she had been drowned; and there was no evidence as to whether the prisoner knew that his first wife was alive; Bramwell, B., left it to the jury whether the prisoner, at the time of his second marriage, knew that his first wife was alive. (n)

The third exception provides that the Act shall not extend 'to any person who at the time of such second marriage shall have been divorced from the bond of the first marriage.' A divorce, therefore, a mensâ et thoro, which was held sufficient under the 1 Jac. 1, (o) is now no longer an exception. Nor would a judicial separation under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 16, suffice, for it is to have the effect of a divorce a mensâ et thoro. (p) It was held under the 1 Jac. 1, that if there be a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, 3rd. Divorce,

Doe v. Bingham, 4 B. & A. 672. Doe v. Hawthorn, 2 B. & A. 96. Hence it is that no indictment for bigamy ever negatives the exceptions contained in the proviso, and hence it follows that the proof of those exceptions lies on the prisoner; if it were otherwise, the prosecutor would have to prove more than he has alleged. Then the proviso in terms requires proof both of the absence of the party for seven years, and that the party shall not have been known by the prisoner to have been living within that time, and consequently it lies on the prisoner to give evidence of both; and as the Legislature has required proof of both, it never could have been intended that proof of the one should be sufficient evidence of the other. When, however, the prisoner has given evidence to negative his knowledge that the party is alive, the onus may be thrown on the prosecutor to show that he had that knowledge; and in accordance with this view is the dictum of Willes, J., in Reg. v. Ellis, 1 F. & F. 309, that 'if the husband has been living apart from his wife for seven years, under such circumstances as to raise a probability that he supposed that she was dead when he was remarried, evidence may be necessary that he knew his first wife was alive.'

As to the manner in which the case should be left to the jury; it should seem that the proper course is to ask them whether they are satisfied that the prisoner was married twice, and that the person whom he first married was alive at the time of the second marriage; and, if they are satisfied of these facts, to tell them that it then lies upon the prisoner to satisfy them that there was an absence for seven years, and also that during the whole of those seven years he was ignorant that his first wife was alive, and that unless he has proved both those facts to their satisfaction they ought to convict him. It is perfectly clear that the question is not whether he knew that his first wife was alive at the time of the second marriage; for he may have known that she was alive within the seven years, and yet not know that she was alive at the time of the second marriage, and, if he knew that she was alive at any time within the seven years, he ought to be convicted.

and an appeal by one of the parties, though this suspends the sentence, and may possibly repeal it, yet a marriage pending that appeal will be aided by the exception. (q) In a case upon the 1 Jac. 1, the question arose, whether a divorce by the Commissary or Consistorial Court of Scotland would operate so as to excuse a person, who, having been married in England, had been divorced by that Court, and had then married again in England, from the penalties of bigamy. And, from the decision of the judges, it appears, that, if the first marriage has taken place in England, it will not be a defence to prove a divorce a vinculo matrimonii before the second marriage, if such divorce were out of England; unless the divorce were upon a ground, which, by the law of England, would warrant such a divorce: the divorces and sentences referred to in the third section of the 1 Jac. 1, being divorces and sentences of the ecclesiastical courts within the limits to which that statute applies. The prisoner was indicted for bigamy: both his marriages were in England; but before his second marriage his wife had obtained a divorce a vinculo from him in the Commissary Court of Scotland. It appeared that he took his wife into Scotland, that she might be induced to institute a suit against him there; and that he cohabited with a prostitute there, for the very purpose of irritating his wife, and furnishing ground for the divorce. A case being reserved and argued, the judges were unanimous, that no sentence or act of any foreign country or state could dissolve an English marriage a vinculo for grounds on which it was not liable to be dissolved a vinculo in England; and that no divorce of an ecclesiastical court was within the exception in the third section of the statute, unless it was the divorce of a court within the limits to which that statute extended. (r) The judges gave no opinion upon the husband's conduct, in drawing on his wife to sue for the divorce, because the jury had not found fraud. (s)

declared void by Court of competent jurisdiction.

The fourth exception is that the Act shall not extend 'to any person whose former marriage shall have been declared void by the sentence of any court of competent jurisdiction.' It was resolved, upon the 1 Jac. 1, by all the judges, that a sentence of the spiritual court against a marriage, in a suit of jactitation of marriage, is not conclusive evidence, so as to stop the counsel for the crown from proving the marriage; the sentence having decided on the invalidity of the marriage only collaterally, and not directly.

(q) 3 Inst. 89. 1 Hale, 694, citing Co. P. C. c. 27, p. 89, and stating further that if the sentence of divorce be repealed, a marriage afterwards is not aided by the exception, though there was once a divorce.

(r) It seems to admit of some doubt whether this case be any authority upon the present Act. The words of the 1 Jac. 1, c. 11, were 'divorced by any sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court.' The words in the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, are, 'divorced from the bond of the first marriage.' These words are so much more general, that it may be contended that they except every case where according to the laws of the country where the divorce takes place, there is a legal divorce a vinculo matrimonii, and the words 'any court of competent jurisdiction' in the next clause, instead of the words 'the Ecclesiastical Court,' in the 1 Jac. 1, c. 11, seem to favour this view of the exception. C. S. G.

(s) Rex v. Lolley, MS. Bayley, J., and R. & R. 237. This case is referred to by the Lord Chancellor, and also by Mr. Brougham, in Tovey v. Lindsay, 1 Dow's Rep. 117. And see 5 Ev. Coll. Stat. 348, note (4). Upon the important subject of the dissolution of marriages, celebrated under the English law, by the Consistorial Court of Scotland, see a publication of Reports of some Decisions of that Court, by James Fergusson, Esq., Advocate, one of the Judges.

And further, admitting such sentence to be conclusive, yet that the counsel for the crown may avoid the effect of such sentence, by proving it to have been obtained by fraud or collusion. (t) There is no exception in the new Act where marriages are within the age of consent. (u)

If a person marrying again come within the second of these exceptions, though the second marriage is not felony, yet, as before the statute, it is null and void, and the parties will be subject to the censures and punishment of the ecclesiastical courts. (v)

Where both marriages were proved, and seven years had not elapsed, and when before the magistrates the prisoner had said that 'she believed her former husband was dead when she married again;' Martin, B., is reported to have said, 'The law says seven years shall elapse before it may be presumed that the first husband is dead. In this case seven years had not elapsed, and beyond the prisoner's own statement there was the mere belief of one witness. Still the jury were to say, if, upon such testimony, she had an honest belief that her first husband was dead; if they believed that she had, then the prisoner would not be guilty.' (w)

Principals in the second degree and accessories before the fact are punishable in the same manner as principals in the first degree; and accessories after the fact are liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour. (x)

Where an indictment charged a woman with bigamy, and the man, with whom she contracted the second marriage, with inciting and counselling the woman to commit the offence of bigamy, it was held that if the man knew at the time of the marriage that she was a married woman, and her husband alive, he might be convicted of counselling her to commit the crime of bigamy. (y)

The indictment in the preceding case did not contain any count charging the man as principal in the second degree; but there is no doubt, where a man marries a woman, knowing such woman to have a husband alive at the time of such marriage, that he is a principal in the second degree, as he is present and aids and assists the woman in committing the felony. (z)

The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, provides that the offender may be tried in the county where he shall be 'apprehended or be in custody.' But the provision of the statute is only cumulative, and the party may be indicted where the second marriage was, though he be never apprehended, and so may be outlawed; for in general where a statute creating a new felony directs that the offender may be tried in the county in which he is apprehended, absence for seven years and ignorance of the first husband or wife being alive during the whole of that time, clearly shows that this case cannot be supported.

but contains no negative words, he may be tried in that county in which the offence was committed. (a)

It was held, on the 1 Jac. 1, which had only the word 'apprehended,' that where the prisoner, having been apprehended for another offence, is detained in the same county for bigamy, the detainer is such an apprehension as will warrant the indicting him in that county. The prisoner was taken up in Worcestershire for a larceny; and whilst in the house of correction for that offence, a bill for bigamy was found against him, which came on to be tried at the assizes for that county; the second marriage was not in Worcestershire. The judges were of opinion that as the prisoner was in custody on a criminal charge, he was liable to be tried where he was imprisoned. (b) Where the indictment is preferred in a county not where the second marriage was, but where the prisoner was apprehended or in custody, it need not state that fact; for it will appear by the caption that he was in custody of the sheriff of the county in which the indictment was found. (c)

Of the first marriage.

A first marriage de facto, subsisting in fact at the time of the second marriage, was sufficient to bring a case within the 1 Jac. 1, though such first marriage were voidable by reason of consanguinity, affinity, or the like; for it was a marriage in judgment of law until it was avoided. (d) And now by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54, s. 1, all marriages celebrated before the 31st of August, 1835, between persons being within the prohibited degrees of affinity, shall not be annulled for that cause by any sentence of the ecclesiastical court, unless pronounced in a suit depending on the 31st of August, 1835, provided that nothing hereinbefore contained shall affect marriages between persons being within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity; and by sec. 2, 'all marriages celebrated after the said 31st of August, between persons within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity shall be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.' Where, therefore, a marriage now takes place within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity, as such marriage is wholly void, a second marriage will not amount to the crime of bigamy. Where, therefore, on an indictment for bigamy, it appeared that the prisoner had married two sisters, one after the death of the other, and the latter marriage was alleged in the indictment as the legal marriage, it was held that he was entitled to be acquitted, as that marriage was null and void to all intents and purposes. tion made that the defect was cured by the caption; this case, therefore, may now be considered no authority. See Reg. v. O'Connor, 5 Q. B. 34. See Rex v. Treharne, R. & M. C. C. R. 298. as the legitimate child of a late wife's parents. Therefore a marriage with the illegitimate sister of a deceased wife is void. (f) So a marriage of a man with the daughter of the illegitimate half-sister of his deceased wife is void. (g) And the Act extends to the marriages of British subjects abroad. Where, therefore, Mr. Brook was duly married, according to the laws of Denmark, near Altona in Denmark, to the lawful sister of his deceased wife, and he and his second wife were then domiciled in England, and had merely gone over to Denmark on a temporary visit; it was held that this marriage, though valid in Denmark, was absolutely void in England. (h) But it has been ruled that though a lawful canonical marriage need not be proved, yet a marriage in fact (whether regular or not) must be shown; (i) which it seems must be understood where there is prima facie evidence of a lawful marriage. (k) Where the first marriage, which was with a Roman Catholic woman, was by a Romish priest in England, not according to the ritual of the Church of England, and the ceremony was performed in Latin, which the witnesses did not understand, and could not therefore swear that the ceremony of marriage according to the Church of Rome was read; it was directed that the defendant should be acquitted. (l) Willes, C. J., who tried him seemed to be of opinion that a marriage by a priest of the Church of Rome was a good marriage, (m) if the ceremony according to that church could be proved; namely, the words of the contracting part of it.

The former Marriage Act, 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, required all marriages to be by banns or license: and declared that all marriages solemnized in any other place than a church or public chapel (unless by special license), or solemnized without publication of banns or license, should be null and void to all intents and purposes. It contained also special provisions as to the publication of banns; and, as to marriages by license, it provided that all such marriages, where either of the parties, not being a widower or widow, was under the age of twenty-one years, had without the consent of the father of such of the parties so under age (if then living) first had and obtained; or if dead, of the guardian or guardians of the person of the party so under age, lawfully appointed, or one of them; and in case there was no such guardian or guardians, then of the mother (if living and unmarried); or if there was no mother living and unmarried, then of a guardian or guardians of the person appointed by the Court of Chancery: should be abso-

A pauper, not being a widow, and being under age, was married by license in 1808, without the consent of her father, who was then living, and continued to live with her husband till 1825, when she married another man, her first husband being still alive; it was held that the first marriage was rendered valid by 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, s. 2, because the parties had lived together till that Act passed, and was not rendered invalid by the pauper's subsequent marriage to another person. By sec. 4 licenses were to be granted to solemnize matrimony in the church or chapel of such parish only where one of the parties had resided for four weeks before. But by sec. 10 proof of the actual dwelling in the parishes, &c., where a marriage was by banns, or of the usual place of abode of one of the parties, where a marriage was by license, was made unnecessary after the solemnization of the marriage, and evidence was not to be received in either of these cases to prove the contrary, in any suit touching the validity of the marriage.

(o) 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, s. 2. Sec. 3 provided that the Act should not render valid any marriage declared invalid by any court of competent jurisdiction before the passing of the Act; nor any marriage where either party should at any time afterwards, during the life of the other party, have lawfully intermarried with any other person. Nor (by sec. 4) any marriage, the invalidity of which had been established before the passing of the Act, upon the trial of any issue touching its validity, or touching the legitimacy of any person alleged to be the descendant of the parties to such marriage. Nor (by sec. 5) any marriage the validity of which, or the legitimacy of any person alleged to be the lawful descendant of the parties married, had been duly brought into question in proceedings in any cause, &c., in which judgments or decrees, or orders of court, had been pronounced or made before the passing of the Act, in consequence of or from the effects of proof in such causes, &c., of the validity of such marriage, or the illegitimacy of such descendant. By sec. 6, if before the Act, any property had been possessed, or any title of honour enjoyed on the ground of the invalidity of any marriage, by reason that it was solemnized without consent, then, although no sentence had been pronounced against the validity of such marriage, the right and interest in such property or title of honour should in no manner be affected or prejudiced. And by sec. 7 nothing in the Act was to affect any act done before the passing of the Act, under the authority of any court, or in the administration of any personal estate or effects, or the execution of any will or testament, or the performance of any trust.

ultimately allowed out of the rent of the husband's land, but whether by his direction or not did not appear; it was held that the marriage was not rendered valid by the 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, s. 2. (q)

A prisoner was married on the 30th of August, 1822, by license, and without the consent of either of her parents, she being between sixteen and seventeen years of age; it was held, on a case reserved, that the marriage was valid, for under the 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, which passed on the 22nd of July, 1822, the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, s. 11, had ceased to operate, and the provisions as to marriages by licenses in the 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, did not come into force till the 1st of September following. (r)

The 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, contained also enactments as to the granting of licenses, the consent of parents and guardians, and the publication of banns, which have been repealed by the 4 Geo. 4, c. 17, which enacted, that licenses should and might be granted by the same persons, and in the same manner and form, and, in the case of minors, with the same consent, and banns be published in the same manner and form as licenses and banns were respectively regulated by the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33; and enacted also (by sec. 2) that all marriages which had been or should be solemnized under licenses granted, or banns published, conformably to the provisions of the 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, should be good and valid; and that no marriage solemnized under any license granted in the form or manner prescribed by either the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, or the 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, should be deemed invalid on account of want of consent of any parent or guardian. The old Marriage Act was then in a great measure revived, though only for a short period. The 4 Geo. 4, c. 5, was passed to render valid certain marriages which had been solemnized by licenses granted through error, after the passing of the 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, by or in the name of bodies corporate or persons their officers or surrogates, other than the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the bishops within their respective dioceses, who were alone authorized to grant such licenses by the 3 Geo. 4, c. 75; but this provision of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 5, applies only to marriages solemnized by such erroneous licenses granted after the 3 Geo. 4, and before the passing of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 5.

The 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, reciting that it is expedient to amend the laws respecting marriages in England, enacts, that, after the 1st day of November, 1823, so much of the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, as was in force immediately before the passing of this Act, and also the 4 Geo. 4, c. 17, shall be repealed, save and except as to any acts, matters, or things, done under the provisions of either of the said Acts, before the said 1st day of November, as to which the said Acts are respectively to be of the same force and effect, as if this Act had not been made.

Book to be provided for the registration of banns.

Sec. 6. 'On or before the said 1st day of November, and from time to time afterwards as there shall be occasion, the churchwardens and chapelwardens of churches and chapels, wherein marriages are solemnized, shall provide a proper book of substantial paper, marked and ruled respectively in manner directed for the register book of marriages; and the banns shall be published from the said register book of banns by the officiating minister, and not from loose papers, and after publication shall be signed by the officiating minister, or by some person under his direction.'

(s) See as to the registration of marriages, 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 86, ss. 1, 30, 31.

Sec. 7. 'No parson, vicar, minister, or curate, shall be obliged to publish the banns of matrimony between any persons whatsoever, unless the persons to be married shall, seven days at the least before the time required for the first publication of such banns respectively, deliver, or cause to be delivered to such parson, vicar, minister, or curate, a notice in writing, dated on the day on which the same shall be so delivered, of their true Christian names and surnames, and of the house or houses of their respective abodes within such parish or chapelry as aforesaid, and of the time during which they have dwelt, inhabited, or lodged, in such house or houses respectively.'

Notice of names, and place and time of abode of parties to be given to the minister.

Sec. 8. 'No parson, minister, vicar, or curate, solemnizing marriages after the first day of November next, between persons, both or one of whom shall be under the age of twenty-one years, after banns published, shall be punishable by ecclesiastical censures for solemnizing such marriages without consent of parents or guardians, unless such parson, minister, vicar, or curate, shall have notice of the dissent of such parents or guardians; and in case such parents or guardians, or one of them, shall openly and publicly declare or cause to be declared, in the church or chapel where the banns shall be so published, at the time of such publication, his, her, or their dissent to such marriage, such publication of banns shall be absolutely void.'

How far ministers not punishable for marrying minors without consent. In what case publication of banns void.

Sec. 9. 'Whenever a marriage shall not be had within three months after the complete publication of banns, no minister shall proceed to the solemnization of the same, until the banns shall have been republished on three several Sundays, in the form and manner prescribed in this Act, unless by license duly obtained according to the provisions of this Act.'

In what case republication of banns necessary.

Sec. 10. 'No license of marriage shall, from and after the said first day of November, be granted by any archbishop, bishop, or other ordinary, or person having authority to grant such licenses, to solemnize any marriage in any other church or chapel than in the parish church, or in some public chapel of or belonging to the parish or chapelry within which the usual place of abode of one of the persons to be married shall have been for the space of fifteen days immediately before the granting of such license.'

Licenses to marry in church, &c., of parish wherein one party resided for 15 days before.

Sec. 11. 'If any caveat be entered against the grant of any license for a marriage, such caveat being duly signed by or on the behalf of the person who enters the same, together with his place of residence, and the ground of objection on which his caveat is founded, no license shall issue till the said caveat, or a true copy thereof, be transmitted to the judge out of whose office the license is to issue, and until the judge has certified to the register that he has examined into the matter of the caveat, and is satisfied that it ought not to obstruct the grant of the license for the said marriage, or until the caveat be withdrawn by the party who entered the same.'

Where caveat entered, no license to issue till matter examined by judge.

Sec. 12. 'All parishes where there shall be no parish church or chapel belonging thereto, or none wherein divine service shall be usually solemnized every Sunday, and all extra-parochial places whatever, having no public chapel wherein banns may be lawfully published, shall be deemed and taken to belong to any parish or chapelry next adjoining, for the purposes of this Act only; and where banns shall be published in any church or chapel of any parish or chapelry adjoining to any such parish or chapelry where there shall be no church or chapel, or none wherein divine service shall be solemnized as aforesaid, or to any extra-parochial place as aforesaid, the parson, vicar, minister, or curate, publishing such banns, shall, in writing under his hand, certify the publication thereof in the same manner as if either of the persons to be married had dwelt in such adjoining parish or chapelry.'

Sec. 13. 'If the church of any parish, or chapel of any chapelry, wherein marriages have been usually solemnized, be demolished in order to be rebuilt, or be under repair, and on such account be disused for public service, it shall be lawful for the banns to be proclaimed in a church or chapel of any adjoining parish or chapelry in which banns are usually proclaimed, or in any place within the limits of the parish or chapelry which shall be licensed by the bishop of the diocese for the performance of divine service, during the repair or rebuilding of the church as aforesaid; and where no such place shall be so licensed, then, during such period as aforesaid, the marriage may be solemnized in the adjoining church or chapel wherein the banns have been proclaimed, and all marriages heretofore solemnized in other places within the said parishes or chapelries than the said churches or chapels, on account of their being under repair, or taken down in order to be rebuilt, shall not be liable to have their validity questioned on that account, nor shall the ministers who have so solemnized the same be liable to any ecclesiastical censure, or to any other proceeding or penalty whatsoever.' This enactment being defective in not providing that marriages might be solemnized in the places licensed for the proclamation of banns; nor that marriages might be solemnized by license in an adjoining church or chapel; nor that the validity of marriages thereafter solemnized in other places than the churches and chapels out of repair, should not be questioned on that account; nor that the ministers who should thereafter solemnize such marriages should not be liable to ecclesiastical censure, &c.; the 5 Geo. 4, c. 32, enacts, that 'all marriages which have been heretofore solemnized, or which shall be hereafter solemnized in any place within the limits of such parish or chapelry so licensed for the performance of divine service, during the repair or rebuilding of the church of any parish, or chapel of any chapelry, wherein marriages have been usually solemnized; or if no such place shall be so licensed, then in a church or chapel of any adjoining parish or chapelry in which banns are usually proclaimed, whether by banns lawfully published in such church or chapel, or by license lawfully granted, shall not have their validity questioned on account of their having been so solemnized, nor shall the ministers who have so solemnized the same be liable to any ecclesiastical censure, or to any other proceeding.' And that all licenses granted by any person having authority to grant them for the solemnization of marriages in a church or chapel, wherein marriages have been usually solemnized, shall be deemed to be licenses for the solemnization of marriages in any place within the limits of such parish or chapelry, which shall be licensed by the bishop for the performance of divine service, during the repair or rebuilding of any such church or chapel, or if no place shall be so licensed, then in the church or chapel of any adjoining parish or chapelry wherein marriages have been usually solemnized. (t) And also that all banns proclaimed, and all marriages solemnized, according to the provisions of this Act in any place so licensed, within the limits of any parish or chapelry, during the repair or rebuilding of the church, &c., shall be considered as proclaimed and solemnized in the church, &c., and shall be so registered accordingly. (u)

The 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 14, enacts, 'for avoiding all fraud and collusion in obtaining of licenses for marriage, that before any such license be granted, one of the parties shall personally swear before the surrogate, or other person having authority to grant the same, that he or she believeth that there is no impediment of kindred or alliance, or of any other lawful cause, nor any suit commenced in any ecclesiastical court, to bar or hinder the proceeding of the said matrimony according to the tenor of the said license; and that one of the said parties hath, for the space of fifteen days immediately preceding such license, had his or her usual place of abode within the parish or chapelry within which such marriage is to be solemnized; and, where either of the parties, not being a widower or widow, shall be under the age of twenty-one years, that the consent of the person or persons whose consent to such marriage is required under the provisions of this Act has been obtained thereto: provided always, that if there shall be no such person or persons having authority to give such consent, then upon oath made to that effect by the party requiring such license, it shall be lawful to grant such license, notwithstanding the want of any such consent.'

Sec. 15. 'It shall not be required of any person applying for such license to give any caution or security, by bond or otherwise, before such license is granted, anything in any Act or canon to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.'

Sec. 16. 'The father, if living, of any party under twenty-one years of age, such parties not being a widower or widow; or, if the father shall be dead, the guardian or guardians of the person of the party so under age, lawfully appointed, or one of them; and, in case there shall be no such guardian or guardians, then the mother of such party, if unmarried; and, if there shall be no mother unmarried, then the guardian or guardians of the person appointed by the Court of Chancery, if any, or one of them, shall have authority to give consent to the marriage of such party; and such consent is hereby required for the marriage of such party so under age, unless there shall be no person authorised to give such consent.' (v)

(u) Sec. 3. Since the last edition of this work the following Acts have passed on this subject:—The 6 Geo. 4, c. 93, to render valid marriages solemnized in certain churches and public chapels, in which banns had not been usually published. The 11 Geo. 4, c. 18, to render valid marriages solemnized in certain churches and chapels, during the rebuilding or repairing churches, &c., and in churches of distinct or district parishes, established under the 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, and the 59 Geo. 3, c. 134, and in certain chapels. The 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 28, as to marriages in Scotland by Roman Catholic priests. The 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 45, as to marriages at Hamburg since the abolition of the British factory there, and many other Acts have passed to render valid marriages in particular churches and chapels.

Oath to be taken before the surrogate as to certain particulars before license is granted.

Bond not to be required before granting license.

Who are to give consent, if parties are under age.

If the father of minor be non compos mentis, or if guardian or mother of minor be non compos mentis, or beyond sea, &c., parties may apply to the Lord Chancellor.

Sec. 17. 'In case the father or fathers of the parties to be married, or of one of them, so under age as aforesaid, shall be non compos mentis, or the guardian or guardians, mother or mothers, or any of them, whose consent is made necessary as aforesaid to the marriage of such party or parties, shall be non compos mentis, or in parts beyond the seas, or shall unreasonably, or from undue motives, refuse, or withhold his, her, or their consent, to a proper marriage, then it shall and may be lawful for any person desirous of marrying, in any of the before-mentioned cases, to apply by petition to the Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper, or the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal of Great Britain for the time being, Master of the Rolls, or Vice-Chancellor of England, who is and are respectively hereby empowered to proceed upon such petition in a summary way; and in case the marriage proposed shall upon examination appear to be proper, the said Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper, or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal for the time being, Master of the Rolls, or Vice-chancellor, shall judicially declare the same to be so; and such judicial declaration shall be deemed and taken to be as good and effectual, to all intents and purposes, as if the father, guardian or guardians, or mother of the person so petitioning, had consented to such marriage.'

Surrogate to take oath of office.

Sec. 18. 'From and after the said first day of November, no surrogate, hereafter to be deputed by any ecclesiastical judge who hath power to grant licenses, shall grant any such license until he hath taken an oath before the said judge, or before a commissioner appointed by commission under the seal of the said judge, which commission the said judge is hereby authorised to issue, faithfully to execute his office according to law, to the best of his knowledge, and hath given security by his bond in the sum of one hundred pounds to the bishop of the diocese for the due and faithful execution of his said office.'

In what case new license to be obtained.

Sec. 19. 'Whenever a marriage shall not be had within three months after the grant of a license by any archbishop, bishop, or any ordinary or person having authority to grant such license, no minister shall proceed to the solemnization of such marriage until a new license shall have been obtained, unless by banns duly published according to the provisions of this Act.'

Right of Archbishop of Canterbury to grant special licenses, as under 25 Hen. 8, c. 21.

Sec. 20. 'Nothing hereinbefore contained shall be construed to extend to deprive the Archbishop of Canterbury and his successors, and his and their proper officers, of the right which hath hitherto been used, in virtue of a certain statute made in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of the late King Henry the Eighth, intituled, "An Act concerning Peter-pence and Dispensations," of granting special licenses to marry at any convenient time or place.' (w)

Marriage void where persons wilfully marry in any other place than a church, &c.

Sec. 22. 'If any persons shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry in any other place than a church, or such public chapel wherein banns may be lawfully published, unless by special license as aforesaid, or shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry without due publication of banns, or license from a person or persons

(w) By sec. 21, persons solemnizing marriage in any other place than a church or chapel, or without banns or license, or under pretence of being in holy orders, shall be transported for fourteen years, the prosecution to be commenced within three years.

having authority to grant the same first had and obtained, or shall knowingly and wilfully consent to or acquiesce in the solemnization of such marriage by any person not being in holy orders, the marriages of such persons shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever. (x)

Sec. 26. 'After the solemnization of any marriage under a publication of banns, it shall not be necessary in support of such marriage to give any proof of the actual dwelling of the parties in the respective parishes or chapelries wherein the banns of matrimony were published; or, where the marriage is by license, it shall not be necessary to give any proof that the usual place of abode of one of the parties, for the space of fifteen days as aforesaid, was in the parish or chapelry where the marriage was solemnized; nor shall any evidence in either of the said cases be received to prove the contrary, in any suit touching the validity of such marriage.' (y)

Sec. 28. 'All marriages shall be solemnized in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, besides the minister who shall celebrate the same; and immediately after the celebration an entry shall be made in the register.'

Sec. 30. 'This Act, or anything therein contained, shall not extend to the marriages of any of the royal family.'

Sec. 31. 'Nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any marriages amongst the people called Quakers, or amongst the persons professing the Jewish religion, where both the parties to any such marriage shall be of the people called Quakers, or persons professing the Jewish religion respectively.' (z)

The 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 1, enacts, that after the 1st of March, 1837, (a) 'notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, all the rules prescribed by the rubric concerning the solemnizing of marriages shall continue to be duly observed by every person in holy orders of the Church of England who shall solemnize any marriage in England: provided always, that where by any law or canon in force before the passing of this Act it is provided that any marriage may be solemnized after publication of banns, such marriage may be solemnized in like manner on production of the registrar's certificate as hereinafter provided; (b) provided also, that nothing in this Act contained shall affect the right of the

Proof of actual residence of parties not necessary to validity of marriage, whether after banns or by license.

Proviso for the royal family.

And for marriages of Quakers and Jews.

After 1st of March, 1837, all rules prescribed by the rubric to be observed.

Marriages may be solemnized on production of registrar's certificate.

(x) By sec. 23, where a marriage is solemnized between parties, one of whom is under age, and not a widower or widow, contrary to the provisions of the Act, by false oath or fraud, the guilty party shall forfeit all property accruing from the marriage.

(y) Upon an enactment nearly similar, it was determined, in a prosecution for bigamy, where the first marriage was proved to have been by banns, that it was no objection that the parties did not reside in the parish where the banns were published and the marriage was celebrated. The provision of the statute was considered as an express answer to the objection; and it appears not to have been adverted to when the point was reserved for the opinion of the judges. Rex v. Hind, R. & R. 253.

(a) By 7 Will. 4, c. 1, the operation of this Act was suspended until after the last day of June 1837.

(b) The 1 Vict. c. 22, s. 36, after reciting this provision, enacts, 'that the giving the notice to the superintendent registrar, and the issue of the superintendent registrar's certificate, as in the said Act and by this Act provided, shall be used and stand instead of the publication of banns to all intents and purposes where no such publication shall have taken place; and every parson, vicar, minister, or curate in England shall solemnize marriage after such notice and certificate as aforesaid in like manner as after due publication of banns: provided always that the church wherein any marriage according to the rites of the Archbishop of Canterbury and his successors, and his and their proper officers, to grant special licenses to marry at any convenient time and place, or the right of any surrogate or other person now having authority to grant licenses for marriages.'

Quakers and Jews.

Sec. 2. 'The Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, and also persons professing the Jewish religion, may continue to contract and solemnize marriage according to the usages of the said society and of the said persons respectively; and every such marriage is hereby declared and confirmed good in law, provided that the parties to such marriage be both of the said society, or both persons professing the Jewish religion respectively, provided also, that notice to the registrar shall have been given, and the registrar's certificate shall have issued in manner hereinafter provided.'^(c)

Superintendent
registrar of births to be superintendent registrar of marriages

Sec. 3. 'The superintendent registrar of births and deaths of every union, parish, or place shall be, in right of his office, superintendent registrar of marriages within such union, parish or place, and such union, parish, or place shall be deemed the district, of such superintendent registrar of marriages.'

Notice of every intended marriage to be given to the superintendent registrar of the district.

Sec. 4. 'In every case of marriage intended to be solemnized in England after the said first day of March, (d) according to the rites of the Church of England (unless by license or by special license, or after publication of banns), and in every case of marriage intended to be solemnized in England after the said first day of March, according to the usages of the Quakers or Jews, or according to any form authorized by this Act, one of the parties shall give notice under his or her hand, in the form of schedule (A.) to this Act annexed, or to the like effect, to the superintendent registrar of the district within which the parties shall have dwelt for not less than seven days then next preceding, or if the parties dwell in the districts of different superintendent registrars shall give the like notice to the superintendent registrar of each district, and shall state therein the name and surname and the profession or condition of each of the parties intending marriage, the dwelling place of each of them, and the time not being less than seven days during which each has dwelt therein, and the church or other building in which the marriage is to be solemnized;

(c) The 23 & 24 Vict. c. 18, recites this clause, and sec. 12 of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 81 (I.), and enacts that after the 30th of June, 1860, 'marriages may be contracted and solemnized according to the usages of the said Society of Friends, called Quakers, in England and Ireland respectively, not only in the case provided for by the said recited provisions, but also in cases where one only or where neither of the parties to the marriage shall be a member of the said society; provided that the party or parties who shall not be a member or members of the said society shall profess with or be of the persuasion of the said society; provided also that no person who is not a member of the said society shall be married according to the usages thereof, unless he or she shall be authorized thereto, under or in pursuance of some general rule or rules of the said society, in England and Ireland respectively; and a copy of such general rule or rules purporting to be signed by the recording clerk for the time being of the said society in London and in Dublin respectively, shall be admitted as evidence of such general rule or rules in all proceedings touching the validity of any such marriage.' By sec. 2, all enactments then in force relating to marriages according to the usages of the said society are extended to every marriage contracted under this Act. All marriages solemnized in England before July 1, 1837, and in Ireland before April 1, 1845, according to the usages of the Quakers or Jews, are rendered valid by the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 58, provided the parties were both Quakers or both persons professing the Jewish religion.

provided that if either party shall have dwelt in the place stated in the notice during more than one calendar month, it may be stated therein that he or she hath dwelt there one month and upwards.' (e)

Sec. 5. 'The superintendent registrar shall file all such notices, and keep them with the records of his office, and shall also forthwith enter a true copy of all such notices fairly into a book, to be for that purpose furnished to him by the registrar general, to be called 'the marriage notice book,' the cost of providing which shall be defrayed in like manner as the cost of providing register books of births and deaths; (f) and the marriage notice book shall be open at all reasonable times without fee to all persons desirous of inspecting the same; and for every such entry the superintendent registrar shall be entitled to have a fee of one shilling.'

Superintendent registrar to keep notices in a book.

Sec. 6. 'If such superintendent registrar shall be clerk to the guardians of any poor-law union, or of any parish or place comprising the district for which such superintendent registrar shall act, he shall read such notices as hereinafter directed; and if he shall not be such clerk, then he shall transmit to such clerk on the day previous to each weekly meeting of such guardians all such notices of intended marriage as he shall have received on or since the day previous to the weekly meeting immediately preceding the same; and such clerk shall read such notices immediately after the minutes of the proceedings of such guardians at their last meeting shall have been read; and such notices shall be so read three several times in three successive weeks at the weekly meetings of such guardians, unless in any case license for marriage shall be sooner granted, and notice of such license being granted shall have been given to such clerk: provided also, that if it shall happen that the board of guardians of any such union, parish, or place shall not so meet, it shall be sufficient for the purposes of this Act that such notices shall be read at any meeting of such guardians which shall be held within twenty-one days from the day of such notice being entered.' (g)

Notices to be read at meetings of guardians.

The 1 Vict. c. 22, s. 24, reciting this section, and that 'it may happen in certain superintendent registrars' districts that there may be no such guardians,' enacts, 'that in every such case, but only until the election of such board of guardians and of a clerk to their board, every notice of marriage given according to the provisions of the said Act for marriages, or a true and exact copy thereof, under the hand of the superintendent registrar, shall be suspended in some conspicuous place in the office of the superintendent registrar during seven successive days, if the marriage is to be solemnized by license, or twenty-one successive days if the marriage is to be solemnized without license, before any marriage shall be solemnized in pursuance of such notice; and the particulars of every such notice shall be sent by the superintendent registrar to every registrar of marriages within his district, and shall be open to the inspection of every one who shall apply at reasonable times to such registrar to inspect the same.' (h)

Notices of marriage to be suspended in the superintendent registrar's office, instead of being read at the meetings of guardians, &c.

(e) By 1 Vict. c. 22, s. 10, the registrar-general may unite two or more districts, and by sec. 11 may divide districts. See the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119, s. 3, post, p. 294.

(f) Repealed as to the costs of registers by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 25, s. 6.

After seven days, or twenty-one days, certificate of notice to be given upon demand.

Issue of superintendent registrar's certificate may be forbidden.

Consent.

Superintendent registrar may grant licenses for marriage.

By the 6 & 7 Will. 4, s. 7, 'after the expiration of seven days if the marriage is to be solemnized by license, or of twenty-one days if the marriage is to be solemnized without license, after the entry of such notice, the superintendent registrar, upon being requested so to do by or on behalf of the party by whom the notice was given, shall issue under his hand a certificate in the form of schedule (B.) to this Act annexed, provided that no lawful impediment be shown to the satisfaction of the superintendent registrar why such certificate should not issue, and provided that the issue of such certificate shall not have been sooner forbidden in manner hereinafter mentioned by any person or persons authorized in that behalf as hereinafter is provided; and every such certificate shall state the particulars set forth in the notice, the day on which the notice was entered, and that the full period of seven days or of twenty-one days (as the case may be) has elapsed since the entry of such notice, and that the issue of such certificate has not been forbidden by any person or persons authorized in that behalf; and for every such certificate the superintendent registrar shall be entitled to have a fee of one shilling.' (i)

Sec. 9. 'Any person authorized in that behalf may forbid the issue of the superintendent registrar's certificate by writing at any time before the issue of such certificate the word 'forbidden' opposite to the entry of the notice of such intended marriage in the marriage notice book, and by subscribing thereto his or her name and place of abode, and his or her character, in respect of either of the parties, by reason of which he or she is so authorized; and in case the issue of any such certificate shall have been so forbidden the notice and all proceedings thereupon shall be utterly void.'

Sec. 10. 'After the said first day of March, (k) the like consent shall be required to any marriage in England solemnized by license as would have been required by law to marriages solemnized by license immediately before the passing of this Act; and every person whose consent to a marriage by license is required by law is hereby authorized to forbid the issue of the superintendent registrar's certificate, whether the marriage is intended to be by license or without license.'

Sec. 11. 'After the said first day of March (k) every superintendent registrar shall have authority to grant licenses for marriage in any building registered as hereinafter provided within any district under his superintendence, or in his office, in the form of schedule (C.) to this Act annexed, and for every such license shall be entitled to have of the party requiring the same the sum of three pounds above the value of the stamps necessary on granting such license; (l) and every superintendent registrar shall four times in every year, on such days as shall be appointed by the

(i) It was not the intention of this Act that the registrar should have power to grant his certificate for marriages out of his own district, and, consequently, the superintendent registrar has no power to grant his certificate under this section, where it is proposed that the marriage should take place out of his district. Ex parte Brady, 8 Dow. P. C. 332. Patteson, J.

By sec. 8 the registrar-general is to furnish the superintendent registrars with forms of certificates, which are to be distinguished in certain ways where the marriage is by license, and where it is without license.

registrar general, make a return to the registrar general of every license granted by him since his last return, and of the particulars stated concerning the parties: provided always, that no superintendent registrar shall grant any such license until he shall have given security by his bond in the sum of one hundred pounds to the registrar general for the due and faithful execution of his office: provided also, that nothing herein contained shall authorize any superintendent registrar to grant any license for marriage in any church or chapel in which marriages may be solemnized according to the rites of the Church of England, or in any church or chapel belonging to the Church of England or licensed for the celebration of Divine worship according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, or any license for marriage in any registered building which shall not be within his district.'

Superintendent registrar to give security.

Proviso.

Sec. 12. 'Before any license for marriage shall be granted by any such superintendent registrar one of the parties intending marriage shall appear personally before such superintendent registrar, and in case the notice of such intended marriage shall not have been given to such superintendent registrar, shall deliver to him the certificate of the superintendent registrar or superintendent registrars to whom such notice shall have been given, and such party shall make oath, or shall make his or her solemn affirmation or declaration instead of taking an oath, that he or she believeth that there is not any impediment of kindred or alliance or other lawful hindrance to the said marriage, and that one of the said parties hath for the space of fifteen days immediately before the day of the grant of such license had his or her usual place of abode within the district within which such marriage is to be solemnized, and where either of the parties, not being a widower or widow, shall be under the age of twenty-one years, that the consent of the person or persons whose consent to such marriage is required by law has been obtained thereto, or that there is no person having authority to give such consent, as the case may be; and all such licenses and declarations shall be respectively liable to the same stamp duties as licenses for marriage granted by the ordinary of any diocese, and affidavits made in order to procure the same.'

Certificate to be given before the license is granted.

Sec. 13. 'Any person, on payment of five shillings, may enter a caveat with the superintendent registrar against the grant of a certificate or a license for the marriage of any person named therein; and if any caveat be entered with the superintendent registrar, such caveat being duly signed by or on behalf of the person who enters the same, together with his or her place of residence, and the ground of objection on which his or her caveat is founded, no certificate or license shall issue or be granted until the superintendent registrar shall have examined into the matter of the caveat, and is satisfied that it ought not to obstruct the grant of the certificate or license for the said marriage, or until the caveat be withdrawn by the party who entered the same; provided that in cases of doubt it shall be lawful for the superintendent registrar to refer the matter of any such caveat to the registrar general, who shall decide upon the same: provided likewise, that in case of the superintendent registrar refusing the grant of the certificate or license, the person applying for the same shall have a right to appeal to the registrar general, who shall thereupon either confirm the refusal or direct the grant of the certificate or license.'

Caveat may be lodged with superintendent registrar against grant of license of certificate.

Marriages not to be solemnized until after twenty-one days after entry of notice, unless by license.

New notice required after three months.

Sec. 14. 'After the said first day of March^(m) no marriage after such notice as aforesaid, unless by virtue of a license to be granted by the superintendent registrar, shall be solemnized or registered in England until after the expiration of twenty-one days after the day of the entry of such notice as aforesaid; and no marriage shall be solemnized by the license of any superintendent registrar or registered until after the expiration of seven days after the day of the entry of such notice as aforesaid.'

Sec. 15. 'Whenever a marriage shall not be had within three calendar months after the notice shall have been so entered by the superintendent registrar, the notice and certificate, and any license which may have been granted thereupon, and all other proceedings thereupon, shall be utterly void; and no person shall proceed to solemnize the marriage, nor shall any registrar register the same, until new notice shall have been given, and entry made, and certificate thereof given, at the time and in the manner aforesaid.'⁽ⁿ⁾

Places of worship may be registered for solemnizing marriages therein.

Sec. 18. 'Any proprietor or trustee of a separate building, certified according to law as a place of religious worship, may apply to the superintendent registrar of the district, in order that such building may be registered for solemnizing marriages therein, and in such case shall deliver to the superintendent registrar a certificate, signed in duplicate by twenty householders at the least, that such building has been used by them during one year at the least as their usual place of public religious worship, and that they are desirous that such place should be registered as aforesaid, each of which certificates shall be countersigned by the proprietor or trustee by whom the same shall be delivered; and the superintendent registrar shall send both certificates to the registrar general, who shall register such building accordingly in a book to be kept for that purpose at the general register office: and the registrar general shall indorse on both certificates the date of the registry, and shall keep one certificate with the other records of the general register office, and shall return the other certificate to the superintendent registrar, who shall keep the same with the other records of his office; and the superintendent registrar shall enter the date of the registry of such building in a book to be furnished to him for that purpose by the registrar general, and shall give a certificate of such registry under his hand, on parchment or vellum, to the proprietor or trustee by whom the certificates are countersigned, and shall give public notice of the registry thereof by advertisement in some newspaper circulating within the county, and in the "London Gazette."^(o)

Marriages may be solemnized

(n) By sec. 16, the superintendent registrar's certificate or license is to be delivered to the person by or before whom the marriage is solemnized. By sec. 17, the superintendent registrar may appoint registrars of marriages.

(o) By sec. 19, on the removal of the same congregation the new place of worship may be immediately registered, instead of the one disused, and after such substitution it shall not be lawful to solemnize any marriage in such disused building.

be solemnized in the registered building stated as aforesaid in the notice of such marriage, between and by the parties described in the notice and certificate, according to such form and ceremony as they may see fit to adopt: provided nevertheless, that every such marriage shall be solemnized with open doors, between the hours of eight and twelve in the forenoon, in the presence of some registrar of the district in which such registered building is situate, and of two or more credible witnesses: provided also, that in some part of the ceremony, and in the presence of such registrar and witnesses, each of the parties shall declare, in such registered places, in the presence of some registrar and of two witnesses.

“I do solemnly declare, that I know not of any lawful impediment why I, A. B., may not be joined in matrimony to C. D.”

And each of the parties shall say to the other,

“I call upon these persons here present to witness that I, A. B., do take thee, C. D., to be my lawful wedded wife [or husband].”

Provided also, that there be no lawful impediment to the marriage of such parties.

Sec. 21. ‘Any persons who shall object to marry under the provisions of this Act in any such registered building may, after due notice and certificate issued as aforesaid, contract and solemnize marriage at the office and in the presence of the superintendent registrar and some registrar of the district, and in the presence of two witnesses, with open doors, and between the hours aforesaid, making the declaration and using the form of words hereinbefore provided in the case of marriage in any such registered building.’ (p)

Marriages may be celebrated before the superintendent registrar.

Sec. 25. ‘After any marriage shall have been solemnized it shall not be necessary in support of such marriage to give any proof of the actual dwelling of either of the parties previous to the marriage within the district wherein such marriage was solemnized for the time required by this Act, or of the consent of any person whose consent thereunto is required by law: nor shall any evidence be given to prove the contrary in any suit touching the validity of such marriage.’

Proof of residence of parties, or consent not necessary to establish the marriage.

Sec. 26. ‘With the consent under the hand and seal of the patron and incumbent respectively of the church of the parish or district in which may be situated any public chapel with or without a chapelry thereunto annexed, or any chapel duly licensed for the celebration of divine service according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, or any chapel the minister whereof is duly licensed to officiate therein according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, or without such consent after two calendar months’ notice in writing given by the registrar of the diocese to such patron and incumbent respectively, the bishop of the diocese may, if he shall think it necessary for the due accommodation and convenience of the inhabitants, authorize by a license under his hand and seal the solemnization of marriages in any such chapel for persons residing within a district the limits whereof shall Bishops, with consent of patrons, may license chapels for the solemnization of marriages in populous places.

Notice of such licenses to be affixed in chapels.

Marriages performed in such chapels to be under the same regulations as those performed in parish churches.

Option to parties to be married at parish church.

Marriages void if unduly solemnized

Sec. 29. 'There shall be placed in some conspicuous part in the interior of every chapel in respect of which such license shall be given as aforesaid a notice in the words following: "Marriages may be solemnized in this chapel." (r)

Sec. 30. 'All provisions which shall from time to time be in force relative to marriages, and to providing, keeping, and transmitting register books and copies of registers of marriages solemnized in any parish church, shall extend to any chapel in which the solemnization of marriages shall be authorized as aforesaid, in the same manner as if the same were a parish church, and everything required by law to be done relating thereto by the rector, vicar, curate, or churchwardens respectively, of any parish church shall be done by the officiating minister, chapelwarden, or other person exercising analogous duties in such chapel respectively.'

Sec. 31. 'Notwithstanding any such license as aforesaid to solemnize marriages in any such chapel, the parties may, if they think fit, have their marriage solemnized in the parish church, or in any chapel in which heretofore the marriage of such parties or either of them might have been legally solemnized.' 4 Geo. 4, c. 76.

The 1 Vict. c. 22, s. 23, enacts, that 'the registrar general, under the direction of one of her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, shall take order that the solemn declaration and form of words provided to be used in the case of marriages under the said Act for marriages be truly and exactly translated into the Welsh tongue, and shall cause the same so translated to be furnished to every registrar of marriages throughout Wales, and in all places where the Welsh tongue is commonly used; and it shall be lawful to use the declaration and form of words so translated, and published by authority, in all places where the Welsh tongue is commonly used or preferred, in such manner and form and to the same intents and purposes as by the said Act is prescribed in the English tongue.'

Provision for marriages in the Welsh tongue.

Sec. 33. 'The banns of marriage of any persons may be published in any chapel licensed by the bishop, according to the provisions of the said Act for marriages, for the solemnization of marriages, in which those persons might lawfully be married; and instead of the notice required by the said Act the words "Banns may be published and marriages may be solemnized in this chapel" shall be placed in some conspicuous part in the interior of every such chapel.'

Banns may be published in chapels where marriages may be solemnized.

Sec. 34, reciting, that 'doubts may arise whether under the said recited Acts it is lawful for the bishop to license chapels for marriages between parties one only of whom resides within the district specified in such license;' enacts that 'all such licenses shall be construed to extend to and authorize marriages in such chapels between parties one or both of whom is or are resident within the said district; provided always, that where the parties to any marriage intended to be solemnized after publication of banns shall reside within different ecclesiastical districts the banns for such marriage shall be published as well in the church or chapel wherein such marriage is intended to be solemnized as in the chapel licensed under the provisions of the said recited Act for the other district within which one of the parties is resident, and if there be no such chapel then in the church or chapel in which the

Marriages may be in licensed chapels, though only one of the parties is resident in the district.

Publication of banns where the parties reside in different districts.

(t) By sec. 43, in cases of fraudulent marriages, the guilty party is to forfeit all property accruing from the marriage, as in 4 Geo. 4, c. 76; and by sec. 44, the provisions of the Registry Act are extended to this Act.

By sec. 45, 'this Act shall extend only to England, and shall not extend to the marriage of any of the royal family.'

banns of such last-mentioned party might be legally published if the said recited Act had not been passed.'

Any building used exclusively as a Roman Catholic chapel for one year may be registered for celebration of marriages.

Sec. 35. 'Any building which shall have been licensed and used during one year next before registration for public religious worship as a Roman Catholic chapel exclusively shall be taken to be a separate building for the purpose of being registered for the celebration of marriages, notwithstanding the same shall be under the same roof with any other building, or shall form a part only of a building.'

Certificate of notice not to be granted for marriages out of the district where the parties dwell, &c.

The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 72, s. 1, reciting the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, and 1 Vict. c. 22, and that it is expedient to restrain marriages under the 6 & 7 Will. 4, from being solemnized out of the district, in which one of the parties dwells, unless either of the parties dwells in a district, within which there is not any registered building, enacts, 'that it is not and shall not be lawful for any superintendent registrar to give any certificate of notice of marriage where the building in which the marriage is to be solemnized, as stated in the notice, shall not be within the district wherein one of the parties shall have dwelt for the time required by the said Act of his late Majesty, except as hereinafter is enacted.'

In what case marriage may be solemnized out of the district in which the parties dwell.

Sec. 2. 'It shall be lawful for any party intending marriage under the provisions of the said Act of his late Majesty, in addition to the notice required to be given by that Act, to declare at the time of giving such notice, by indorsement thereon, the religious appellation of the body of Christians to which the party professeth to belong, and the form, rite, or ceremony which the parties desire to adopt in solemnizing their marriage, and that, to the best of his or her knowledge and belief, there is not within the district in which one of the parties dwells any registered building in which marriage is solemnized according to such form, rite, or ceremony, and the district nearest to the residence of that party in which a building is registered wherein marriage is so solemnized, and the registered building within such district in which it is intended to solemnize their marriage; and after the expiration of seven days or twenty-one days, as the case may require, under the said Act of his late Majesty, it shall be lawful for the superintendent registrar to whom any such notice shall have been given to issue his certificate, according to the provisions of that Act; and after the issuing of such certificate the parties shall be at liberty to solemnize their marriage in the registered building stated in such notice: Provided always, that after any marriage shall have been solemnized it shall not be necessary in support of such marriage to give any proof of the truth of the facts herein authorized to be stated in the notice, nor shall any evidence be given to prove the contrary in any suit touching the validity of such marriage.'(u)

Provision as to marriages of members of the Society of Friends, and Jews.

Sec. 5. 'Notwithstanding anything herein or in the said recited Acts or either of them contained, the Society of Friends commonly called Quakers, and also persons professing the Jewish religion, may lawfully continue to contract and solemnize marriage according to the usages of the said society and of the said persons respectively, after notice for that purpose duly given, and certificate or certificates duly issued, pursuant to the provision of the said recited Act of his late Majesty, notwithstanding the building or place wherein such marriage may be contracted or solemnized be not situate within the district or either of the districts (as the case may be) in which the parties shall respectively dwell.'

The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119, which came into force Jan. 1, 1857, recites that it is expedient to alter and amend the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, 1 Vict. c. 22, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 72, and by sec. 1 enacts, 'In case of any party intending marriage under the provisions of any of the said recited Acts or of this Act, no notice of such intended marriage shall be read or published before the guardians of any Poor-law union or parish or place, or be transmitted by any superintendent registrar to the clerk of any such guardians.'

Sec. 2. 'In case any party shall intend marriage, under the provisions of any of the said recited Acts or of this Act, the party so intending marriage shall, at the time of giving to the superintendent registrar or respective superintendent registrars, as the case may be, the notice required by the said recited Acts or either of them, make and sign or subscribe a solemn declaration in writing, in the body or at the foot of such notice, that he or she believes that there is no impediment of kindred or alliance or other lawful hindrance to the said marriage, and that the parties to the said marriage, in case the marriage is intended to be had without license, have, for the space of seven days immediately preceding the giving of such notice, had their usual place of abode and residence within the district of the superintendent registrar or respective superintendent registrars to whom such notice or notices, as the case may be, shall be so given; or, in case such marriage is intended to be had by license, that one of the said parties hath for the space of fifteen days immediately preceding the giving of such notice had his or her usual place of abode and residence within the district of the superintendent registrar to whom such notice shall be so given; and when either of the parties intending marriage, and not being a widower or widow, shall be under the age of twenty-one years, the party making such declaration shall further declare that the consent of the person or persons whose consent to such marriage is by law required has been given, or (as the case may be) that there is no person whose consent to such marriage is by law required; and every declaration so made as aforesaid shall be signed and subscribed, by the party making the same, in the presence of the superintendent registrar to whom the notice of marriage containing such declaration is given, or in the presence of his deputy, or of some registrar of births and deaths or of marriages for the district in which the party giving such notice resides, or of the deputy of such registrar, who shall respectively attest the same by adding thereto his name, description, and place of abode; and no certificate or license for marriage shall be issued or granted pursuant to any such notice as aforesaid unless the said notice be accompanied by such solemn declaration duly made and signed or subscribed and attested as aforesaid; and every person who shall knowingly or wilfully make and sign or subscribe any false declaration, or who shall sign any false notice for the purpose of procuring any marriage under the provisions of any of the said recited Acts or this Act, shall suffer the penalties of perjury.'

No notice of marriage to be read or published before Poor-law guardians, or be transmitted to the clerk of such guardians.

Sec. 3. 'Every notice of marriage which shall be given under the provisions of any of the said recited Acts or of this Act, after this Act shall have come into operation, shall be in the form of Schedule (A.) to this Act annexed, or to the like effect; and in every case where the marriage is intended to be had and solemnized under the provisions of the said recited Act of the third and fourth years of Her Majesty, chapter seventy-two, such notice shall, in addition to the several particulars comprised in the said schedule, contain the declaration required to be made by one of the parties to such intended marriage, pursuant to the second section of the said last-mentioned Act; and the superintendent registrar to whom any such notice of marriage shall be so given shall forthwith enter the particulars and the date thereof, and the name of the party giving the same, into the marriage notice book; and for every such entry the superintendent registrar shall be entitled to have a fee of one shilling.'

Sec. 4. 'In case any party shall intend marriage without license under the provisions of any of the said recited Acts or of this Act, the superintendent registrar to whom notice of such intended marriage has been given shall cause the notice of marriage, or a true and exact copy thereof, as entered in the marriage notice book, under the hand of such superintendent registrar, to be suspended or affixed in some conspicuous place in the office of the said superintendent registrar during twenty-one successive days next after the day of the entry of such notice in his "Marriage notice book," before any marriage shall be solemnized in pursuance of such notice, and after the expiration of twenty-one days next after the day of the entry of such notice in his "Marriage notice book," the superintendent registrar shall issue under his hand, upon the request of the party giving such notice, a certificate in the form or to the effect of the certificate set forth in Schedule (B.) to this Act annexed, provided that in the meantime no lawful impediment to the issuing of such certificate be shown to the satisfaction of the same superintendent registrar, and provided the issue of such certificate shall not have been forbidden in the manner provided by either of the said firstly and secondly recited Acts by some person or persons authorized in that behalf; and every such certificate shall state the particulars set forth in the said notice, and the day on which the same notice was entered, and that the issue of such certificate has not been forbidden by any person or persons authorized in that behalf; and for every such certificate the superintendent registrar shall be entitled to have and receive a fee of one shilling; and at any time within three calendar months next after the day of the entry of such notice the intended marriage may be solemnized under the authority of the said certificate; and every superintendent registrar's certificate for marriage duly issued under the provisions of this Act shall have the same force, validity, and effect as the like certificate issued under the provisions of the said recited Acts or either of them would have had in case this Act had not been passed.'

Sec. 5. 'In case any party shall intend marriage by license under the provisions of any of the said recited Acts or of this Act, notice of such intended marriage shall not be suspended in the office of the superintendent registrar, but the party giving the same shall state therein that such marriage is intended to be celebrated by license.'

Sec. 6. 'In any case of marriage intended to be solemnized by license, under the provisions of either of the said two firstly recited Acts or of this Act, between parties both of whom do not dwell in the same superintendent registrar's district, it shall not be required that notice of such intended marriage shall be given to more than one superintendent registrar, but a notice to the superintendent registrar of the district in which one of the parties so intending marriage resides shall be sufficient; and it shall not be required that the said notice shall state how long each of the said parties has resided in his or her dwelling-place, but only how long the party residing in the district in which the notice is given has so resided.'(v)

Sec. 9. 'Every superintendent registrar receiving notice of an intended marriage to be solemnized by license as aforesaid shall, after the expiration of one whole day next after the day of the entry of such notice in his "Marriage notice book," issue under his hand, upon the request of the party giving such notice, a certificate in the form or to the effect of the certificate set forth in the said Schedule (B.) to this Act annexed, and also a license to marry, provided that in the meantime no lawful impediment to the issuing of such certificate be shown to the satisfaction of the same superintendent registrar, and provided the issue of such certificate shall not have been forbidden in the manner provided by either of the said firstly and secondly recited Acts by some person or persons authorized in that behalf; and every such certificate shall state the particulars set forth in the said notice, and the day on which the same notice was entered, and that the issue of such certificate has not been forbidden by any person or persons authorized in that behalf; and for every such certificate the superintendent registrar shall be entitled to have and receive a fee of one shilling; and at any time within three calendar months next after the day of the entry of such notice the intended marriage may be solemnized under the authority of the said license; and every superintendent registrar's certificate and license for marriage duly issued under the provisions of this Act shall have the same force, validity, and effect as the like certificate and license issued under the provisions of the said recited Acts or either of them would have had in case this Act had not been passed.'

Sec. 10. 'The form of a license for marriage so to be granted as aforesaid to any party or parties, by the superintendent registrar of any district as aforesaid, shall be in the form or to the effect of the license set forth in Schedule (C.) to this Act annexed; and for every such license the superintendent registrar granting the same shall be entitled to have and receive of the party requiring the Notice of marriage by license not to be suspended in the office of the superintendent registrar.

In case of marriage by license, notice given to the superintendent registrar of one district shall be sufficient.

In cases of marriage by license certificate of the notice thereof may be given by the superintendent registrar (unless the marriage be forbidden), and thereupon the marriage may be solemnized.

Form of license for marriage.

(v) By sec. 7, notice of marriage without license may be given in Ireland if one of the parties reside there, and marriages where such notices have been given in Ireland are legalised; and by sec. 8, a same the sum of one pound ten shillings, over and above the amount paid for the stamps necessary on granting such license.'

Sec. 11. 'No such marriage as aforesaid shall be solemnized in any such registered building without the consent of the minister or of one of the trustees, owners, deacons, or managers thereof, nor in any registered building of the Church of Rome without the consent of the officiating minister thereof, nor in any church or chapel of the united Church of England and Ireland without the consent of the minister thereof, nor in such latter case by any other than a duly qualified clergyman of the said united church, or with any other forms or ceremonies than those of the said united church, any statute or statutes to the contrary notwithstanding.'

sireous may add the religious ceremony ordained by the church.

Sec. 12. 'If the parties to any marriage contracted at the registry office of any district conformably to the said recited Acts or any of them, or to the provisions of this Act, shall desire to add the religious ceremony ordained or used by the church or persuasion of which such parties shall be members to the marriage so contracted, it shall be competent for them to present themselves for that purpose to a clergyman or minister of the church or persuasion of which such parties shall be members, having given notice to such clergyman or minister of their intention so to do; and such clergyman or minister, upon the production of their certificate of marriage before the superintendent registrar, and upon the payment of the customary fees (if any), may, if he shall see fit, in the church or chapel whereof he is the regular minister, by himself or by some minister nominated by him, read or celebrate the marriage service of the persuasion to which such minister shall belong: Provided always, that no minister of religion who is not in holy orders of the united Church of England and Ireland shall under the provisions of this Act officiate in any church or chapel of the united Church of England and Ireland; but nothing in the reading or celebration of such service shall be held to supersede or invalidate any marriage so previously contracted, nor shall such reading or celebration be entered as a marriage among the marriages in the parish register: Provided also, that at no marriage solemnized at the registry office of any district shall any religious service be used at such registry office.'

Sec. 13. 'When any marriage is intended to be solemnized between parties not of the Society of Friends commonly called Quakers, or not professing the Jewish religion, by license under the provisions of the before-recited Act of the third and fourth years of Her Majesty, chapter seventy two, in a registered building situated in a district within which neither of the parties resides, it shall be lawful for the superintendent registrar to whom notice of such intended marriage shall have been given to grant to the party applying for the same a license for such marriage to be solemnized in the registered building stated in such notice; and every license and certificate granted in pursuance of this enactment shall be as valid and effectual to all intents and purposes as if the same had been granted by the superintendent registrar of the district in which the registered building wherein the marriage is intended to be solemnized is situated.'

Sec. 14. 'When any marriage is intended to be solemnized, under the provisions of any of the before-recited Acts or of this Act, in the usual place of worship of the parties so intending marriage, or one of them, and such place of worship shall be a registered building situated out of the district of their, his, or her residence, it shall be lawful for the superintendent registrar or respective superintendent registrars to whom notice of such marriage shall have been given to grant to the party applying for the same a license or certificate, as the case may be, for such marriage to be solemnized in the registered building stated in such notice, provided such building be situated not more than two miles beyond the limits of the district in which the notice of such marriage has been given, and the party giving notice of such marriage shall at the time of giving the same state therein, in addition to the description of the building in which the marriage is to be solemnized, that it is the usual place of worship of one of the parties, and shall also state the name of the party whose usual place of worship it is; and every license and certificate granted in pursuance of this enactment shall be as valid and effectual, to all intents and purposes, as if the same had been granted by the superintendent registrar of the district in which the registered building wherein the marriage is intended to be solemnized is situated.' (w)

Superintendent registrar may grant license for marriage to be solemnized in registered building out of the district wherein the parties reside.

Sec. 17. 'After any marriage shall have been solemnized, under the authority of any of the said recited Acts or of this Act, it shall not be necessary in support of such marriage to give any proof of the actual dwelling or of the period of dwelling of either of the parties previous to the marriage within the district stated in any notice of marriage to be that of his or her residence, or of the consent to any marriage having been given by any person whose consent thereto is required by law, or that the registered building in which any marriage may have been solemnized had been certified according to law as a place of religious worship, or that such building was the usual place of worship of either of the parties, nor shall any evidence be given to prove the contrary in any suit or legal proceedings touching the validity of such marriage; and all marriages which heretofore have been or which hereafter may be had or solemnized, under the authority of any of the said recited Acts or of this Act, in any building or place of worship which has been registered pursuant to the provisions of the said Act passed in the sixth and seventh years of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, chapter eighty-five, but which may not have been certified as required by law, shall be as valid in all respects as if such place of worship had been so certified.' (x)

Proof of the observance of this Act and of the recited Acts in certain matters is not to be necessary to the validity of marriages.

Sec. 21. 'Any marriage according to the usages of the Society of Friends commonly called Quakers, or to the usages of persons professing the Jewish religion respectively, where the parties

Marriages of Quakers or Jews may be solemnized by license.

(w) By sec. 15, the registrar general may appoint registrars of marriages; and the appointments of registrars of marriages by superintendent registrars are to be subject to his approval. By sec. 16, the registrar of marriages may appoint a deputy, and where such registrar dies or ceases to hold the office, his deputy is to be registrar until a new registrar is appointed.

(x) By sec. 18, persons making false declarations, or giving false notices, or forbidding the granting of a certificate by falsely representing their consent to be required by law, are liable to the penalties of perjury. By sec. 19, in the case of fraudulent marriages, the guilty party is to forfeit all the property accruing from the marriage. By sec. 20, nothing in the Act is to alter the provisions of the existing Acts, except when they are at variance with this Act.

Marriages under this Act good and cognizable.

Extra-parochial places.

Sec. 23. 'Every marriage solemnized under any of the said recited Acts or of this Act shall be good and cognizable in like manner as marriages before the passing of the first-recited Act according to the rites of the Church of England.' (z)

The 20 & 21 Vict. c. 19, provides for the turning of certain extra-parochial places into parishes, and where any such place has a church or chapel of the Church of England within it, the bishop of the diocese may authorize the publication of banns and the solemnization of marriages by banns or license in it. (a) And all the provisions as to keeping of marriage registers are extended to such church or chapel. (b)

The 23 & 24 Vict. c. 24, renders marriages celebrated in any such church or chapel valid where both or either of the parties reside in such district, provided the banns are published in both districts where the parties reside in different districts.

A marriage is good by banns or license where the party is married in an assumed name, if he be known in the place where he is married by such assumed name.

The marriage Acts do not specify what shall be necessary to be observed in the publication of banns, or that the banns shall be published in the true names of the parties; but it must be understood as the clear intention of the legislature that the banns shall be published in the true names, because it requires that notice in writing shall be delivered to the minister of the true Christian names and surnames of the parties seven days before the publication; and, unless such notice be given, he is not obliged to publish the banns. But a publication in the name which the party has assumed, and by which he is known in the parish, appears to be sufficient, and would, indeed, be the proper publication where the party is not known by his real name. Thus, where a person, whose baptismal and surname was Abraham Langley, was married by banns by the name of George Smith, having been known in the parish where he resided and was married by that name only from his first coming into the parish till his marriage, which was about three years, the marriage was held valid. (c) And a marriage by license, not in the party's real name, but in the name which he had assumed, because he had deserted, he being known by that name only in the place where he lodged and was married, and where he had resided sixteen weeks, was also held valid. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, 'If this name had been assumed for the purpose of fraud in order to enable the party to contract marriage, and to conceal himself from the party to whom he was about to be married, that would have been a fraud on the marriage Act and the rights of marriage, and the Court would not have given effect to any such corrupt purpose. But where a name has been previously assumed, so as to have become the name which the party has acquired by reputation, that is, within the meaning of the marriage Act, the party's true name.' (d)

Under the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, if there was a total variation of a name or names, that is, if the banns were published in a name or names totally different from those which the parties, or one of them, ever used, or by which they were ever known, the marriage in pursuance of that publication was invalid; and it was immaterial in such cases, whether the misdescription had arisen from accident or design, or whether such design were fraudulent or not. The pauper and her husband were married in 1817, by banns, by the names of Mary White and Joseph Betts. The husband had been baptized as the son of J. and M. Betts. M. Betts was the daughter of S. Wilson, and her husband having absconded shortly after their marriage, the pauper's husband was brought up by S. Wilson, and always called by the name of Wilson, and never called or known by any other name either before or after his marriage. The pauper was the daughter of J. and M. Hodgkinson, and was never called or known by any name except Hodgkinson till after her marriage, but in the register of her baptism she was described as 'Mary the daughter of S. White and his wife,' which entry was believed to have been a mistake of the clergyman who baptized her. It was held that the marriage was void. Whether the husband was sufficiently designated by the name of Betts it was unnecessary to inquire, as the Court were clearly of opinion that the woman was never known by, and never used the surname of 'White,' so as to make that, in any latitude of construction, 'a true name' within the meaning of the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, s. 2. (e)

But under the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, if there were a partial variation of name only, as the alteration of a letter or letters, or the addition or suppression of one Christian name, or the names had been such as the parties had used, and been known by, at one time, and not at another; in such cases the publication might, or might not be void; the supposed misdescription might be explained, and it became a most important part of the inquiry, whether it was consistent with honesty of purpose, or arose from a fraudulent intention. Under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, both parties must know that there has been no due publication of banns.

But the words of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 22, are wholly different from those of the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, s. 8, and it has been held that in order to invalidate a marriage under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 22, it must be contracted with a knowledge by both parties that no due publication of the banns has taken place. Where, therefore, J. C. told Susannah Spencer that he would see the banns properly published, and she took no steps in the matter, and he told her that they had been published, but procured the banns to be published in the name of Agnes Watts, which name she had never borne; and in performing the service, the clergyman applied to her the name of Agnes, till which time she believed she was about to be married by her own name, and she did not know, until after the marriage, that the banns had been published in a wrong name; it was held that the marriage was valid. (g) But where both the man and the woman were aware that the banns had been published in a manner to conceal the identity of one of them, it was held that the marriage was void. (h)

Omission of one Christian name and false addition, known by both parties.

Edward Croxall Tongue, a minor, of the age of seventeen years, and Mary Ann Allen, a widow, of the age of thirty-five years, were married in 1833 by banns, which were published in the names of Edward Tongue, bachelor, and Mary Ann Allen, spinster; the entry in the register was in the same names and descriptions, and was signed Edward Tongue. The marriage was clandestine and without the knowledge or consent of the parents of Tongue, who was baptized by the names of Edward Croxall Tongue, and though known to some persons by the name of Croxall Tongue or Tongue only, was never known by the name of Edward Tongue. It was admitted that the woman was cognizant of the fraud and intended it; and it was held that as the entry in the register was, Edward Tongue and Mary Ann Allen were married by banns, it was impossible for him not to have known of the publication of the banns; and the signature of only one of his Christian names showed that he must have known that the banns had been published in that name only; and, therefore, he, with the woman, knowingly and wilfully intermarried without due publication of banns. (i)

Wrong Christian name used by the man with consent of the woman.

One Wood was baptized and had always been known by the name of Bower Wood, and never by the name of John Wood, and his banns were published in the names of Margaret Midgley and John Wood; after the first publication the wife told Wood that the name John Wood was wrong. He said it was one of his names, though he had never been called by it; she asked him why he used the name John? He said it was for fear any of his relations should know of his marrying her. She wished him to use the name of Bower; he said he should be disinherited if he did; she asked him if the marriage would be legal under the name of John; he said it would. It was a long time before she would consent to being married to him in the name of John. She did so, because he said if she loved him she would marry him in that name, and would trust to him afterwards. On the 12th of April, 1852, they were married in the names of Margaret Midgley and John Wood. Cresswell, J. O., held that there was not a due publication of banns, as Wood was described in them as John Wood, and both parties were aware of this misdescription when the marriage was solemnized, and therefore the marriage was invalid. (k)

There was also evidence that it was the regular course to make the parties examine the entry in the banns book before a marriage, and see that their names and descriptions were right, and the witness added that she should not have been present at the marriage as a witness, unless the banns had been regularly published.

It seems that the assuming a fictitious name, upon the second marriage, will not prevent the offence from being complete. (l) And it was decided to be no ground of defence, that upon the second marriage (which was by banns) the parties passed by false Christian names when the banns were published, and when the marriage took place; and it was further holden that the prisoner, having written down the names for the publication of the banns, was precluded thereby from saying that the woman was not known by the name he delivered in, and that she was not rightly described by that name in the indictment. The indictment was against the prisoner for marrying Anna Timson whilst he had a wife living: the second marriage was by banns; and, it appeared, that the prisoner wrote the note for the publication of the banns, in which the woman was called Anna, and that she was married by that name, but that her real name was Susannah. Upon a case reserved two questions were made: one, whether this marriage was not void, because there was no publication of banns by the woman's right name, and that, if the second marriage were void, it created no offence: and the other question was, whether the charge of the prisoner's marrying Anna was proved. But the judges held, unanimously, that the second marriage was sufficient to constitute the offence; and that, after having called the woman 'Anna' in the note he gave in for the publication of banns, it did not lie in the prisoner's mouth to say, that she was not known as well by the name of Anna as by that of Susannah, or that she was not rightly called by the name of Anna in the indictment. (m)

So where the prisoner contracted the second marriage in the maiden name of his mother, and the woman he married had also made use of her mother's maiden name, it was unanimously resolved by all the judges that the prisoner was rightly convicted. (n) So where the second wife had never gone or been known by the name of Thick, but had assumed it when the banns were published, that her neighbours might not know she was the person intended, it was held that the parties could not be allowed to evade the punishment for their offence, by contracting a concerted invalid marriage. (o) But where it was proved, by a person present at the prisoner's second marriage, that the woman was married to him by the name of Hannah Wilkinson (the name laid in the indictment), but there was no other proof that the woman was in fact Hannah Wilkinson; it was held that the proof was insufficient, and that to make it sufficient there should have been proof that the prisoner was married to a certain woman by the name of, and who called herself, H. Wilkinson, whereas, in fact, there was no proof that such was her name, or that she had ever before gone by that name; and if the banns had been published in a name which was not her own, and which she had never gone by, the marriage would be invalid. (p) license in a wrong name

without fraud.

A marriage celebrated under a license, in which one of the parties is described by a name wholly different from his own, is not therefore void. George Rudman was taken into custody as the reputed father of a child, of which a woman was pregnant, and married her by license. He gave his name as George Neate at the times of the apprehension and marriage, and was named so in the license, but had never gone by that name before; and the Court of Queen's Bench held this marriage valid. (q)

With fraudulent intention.

Where a marriage was solemnized by license, in which the woman's name was Margaret Bevan; her baptismal name and that by which she was commonly called being 'Margaret Lea Bevan': the license was obtained in the altered name by the man, who knowingly, and by direction of the woman, suppressed the name of 'Lea,' and gave false places of residence, in order that the surrogate might not know who the woman was, and that the intended marriage might be kept secret from her friends; it was held that the question was whether the woman was married without a 'license from a person or persons having authority to grant the same.' There was no doubt the person who granted the license had authority to grant it, and it came therefore to the question whether this was a license for the woman. It was clear that an altered name might represent a person; therefore the name 'Margaret Bevan' might represent her, and as the license was obtained for her and by her direction from a person who had authority to grant it, the marriage was not void. (r)

On the trial of an ejectment in 1842, a marriage was said to have taken place in August in 1784, at a private house under a special license from the Archbishop of Canterbury. There was some evidence of cohabitation and reception: but the plaintiff's counsel offered in evidence an affidavit made for the purpose of obtaining a special license to be married at a private house, and a fiat signed by the Archbishop, directing a license to be made out, as prayed, for a marriage between the parties; both which documents were produced from the Office of Faculties, the proper ecclesiastical office. No search had been made for the original license; and there was proof that such licenses were not kept in any regular custody, but were generally handed over to the officiating clergyman and not taken back from him. A copy of the register of the parish of St. Pancras, which stated the marriage to have been at a private house, by special license, and professed to be signed by the parties, was also offered in evidence. Objection was taken to the fiat as being secondary evidence of the contents of the license, for which no search had been made; but the evidence was admitted; and the Court of Queen's Bench held that it was properly received, as the fiat was an act done in the course of official duty, showing that two persons bearing the names of the lessor of the plaintiff's parents were at that time engaged in taking measures for contracting a marriage; and that it might properly be taken into consideration by the jury as confirming the evidence of their union, which arose from cohabitation and reception. The affidavit and register were proofs of the same general fact. (s)

It has been seen that the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 16, makes the consent of the father, guardians, or mother, necessary to the validity of a marriage by license, where the party is a minor. And it appears to have been held, upon the former marriage Act, that the party prosecuting must show such consent.

Upon an indictment for bigamy, the first marriage imported by the register to have been by license, and the prisoner proved that at that time he was under age. A question was raised, whether this threw it upon the prosecutor to prove consent; and, it appearing that by the marriage Act the register ought to state consent, if either party was under twenty-one, Wilson, J., held it did; and he directed an acquittal. (t) So, after a conviction, the judges, upon much discussion, were of opinion that the form of the register of the first marriage, then in question, which expressed the marriage to have been by license generally, without saying by consent of parents or guardians, together with the fact of the parents never having been known to have been in England, was prima facie evidence that the first marriage was had without the consent of parents or guardians, upon which the jury might have found the prisoner not guilty. (u)

If the prisoner prove that his first marriage took place while he was a minor, and while the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, was in force, it must be shown on the part of the prosecution, that such marriage, if by license, was with the proper consent. The prisoner was indicted for bigamy, in marrying Elizabeth Field, his first wife Lydia being still living: and it was proved that on the 12th of Feb. 1791, he was married to Lydia Blackwell by license, and that she was living on the 8th of June last: and that on the 14th of December, 1800, he married Elizabeth Field. On behalf of the prisoner it was proved that he was born on the 2nd of January, 1771, and that his father was then alive: and it was then contended that the first marriage was void, as it was not proved to have been by the consent of his father.

The prosecutor must have shown the proper consent of parents, &c., if necessary, where the marriage was by license, under the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33.

(u) James's case, R. & R. 17. And the judges directed the prisoner to be discharged on his own recognizance. Lord Kenyon at the first meeting seemed to be of opinion that it was sufficient for the prisoner to prove himself under age at the time of the first marriage; and that it then rested with the prosecutor to show that the marriage was with the consent of parents or guardians, but that the prisoner ought not to be called upon to prove a negative.

Lawrence, J., told the jury that he thought the marriage was to be presumed valid, unless the prisoner proved that he had not that consent, and under his direction the prisoner was found guilty. But the point being saved for the consideration of the judges, they held the conviction wrong; as it was clearly proved that the prisoner was under age at the time of the first marriage, and as there were no circumstances from which consent could be presumed. (v)

Consent to the marriage in the case of illegitimate children.

Though illegitimate children are regarded by the law as not having any father, yet they were held to be within the marriage Act of 26 Geo. 2; and a marriage by license between two illegitimate children, who were minors, without consent of parents or guardians, was therefore held to be void. (w) And formerly it was the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, that the power of consent given by the Act to the father and mother was intended to include reputed parents, as being interested in their children's welfare, and bound to provide for them by the laws of nature: (x) but in a case which came before the Consistorial Court in London, in 1799, a different doctrine was held by the very learned judge of that Court, who was of opinion that the reputed parents were not enabled to consent, and that the consent could be lawfully given only by a guardian appointed by the Court of Chancery. (y) And in a more recent case three of the judges of the Court of King's Bench adopted the latter opinion; and, after much argument and consideration, certified to the Master of the Rolls that all marriages, whether of legitimate or illegitimate persons, were within the general provision of the marriage Act 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, which required all marriages to be by banns or license; and that the consent of the natural mother to the marriage, by license, of an illegitimate minor, was not a sufficient consent within the eleventh section of that Act; and that consequently the marriage in question was void by the said statute. (z)

Since the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, a marriage by a minor without consent is valid.

But a marriage solemnized by license since the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, without consent of parents, where one of the parties is a minor is valid: for the section, which requires such consent, is only directory. The pauper, being under the age of twenty-one years, was married in 1826, by license, without the consent of his father, who was then living; it was objected that this marriage was void under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, for want of the father's consent; but it was held that the marriage was valid. The language of sec. 16 (a) is merely to require consent; it does not proceed to make the marriage void, if solemnized without consent. Sec. 22, declares that certain marriages shall be null and void, and a marriage by license without consent is not specified; and if there were any doubt, it is removed by sec. 23, which in such a case enacts, not that the marriage shall be void, but that all the property accruing from the marriage shall be forfeited. (b)

As the marriage of a minor, under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, without the necessary consent of parents is now valid, it seems that it is not necessary for the prosecutor to prove such consent, and that the absence of such consent would furnish no defence if proved on the part of the prisoner. The 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 25, expressly provides, that after any marriage shall have been solemnized, it shall not be necessary, in support of such marriage, to give any proof of the consent of any person, whose consent thereunto is required by law; nor shall any evidence be given to prove the contrary in any suit touching the validity of any marriage. (c)

Unless a clergyman in holy orders was present at the marriage ceremony, the marriage was null and void at common law before the marriage Act. Where, therefore, A, a member of the established Church in Ireland, went, in 1829, accompanied by B, a Presbyterian, to the house of C, a regularly placed minister of the Presbyterians of the parish where C resided, and there entered into a present contract of marriage with the said B, the minister performing a religious ceremony between them, according to the rites of the Presbyterian church, and A and B lived together as man and wife for some time afterwards; but A, afterwards during B's life, married another person in a parish church in England; it was held, on an indictment for bigamy, that the first contract thus entered into was not sufficient to support the indictment. (d)

A clergyman in holy orders must be present by the common law.

But the preceding case must not be taken to decide that marriages of British subjects in the colonies, or on board ship or elsewhere, where a clergyman cannot be obtained, are invalid. Indeed in a case in India where no clergyman could be obtained, it was held that the preceding decision did not apply. (e).

Unless one cannot be procured.

The law does not admit of any difference, as to the manner in which a marriage is to be celebrated, between the marriage of a clergyman and a layman, and consequently if the bridegroom be a clergyman in holy orders, and perform the ceremony himself, no other clergyman being present, the marriage is invalid. (f)

A witness stated that he was present at the marriage, and that notice of it was duly given to the superintendent registrar, but the latter did not produce it, and said, if he had received it, he had left it at home; it was contended, on behalf of the prisoner, that it was incumbent on the prosecution to show that the first marriage was celebrated in the registered building specified in the notice and certificate, to prove that due notice had been given to the superintendent registrar, and that the certificate of the notice had been duly issued. But, on a case reserved, all the judges present held the evidence sufficient. (g)

Proof of a marriage under the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85.

Upon an indictment for bigamy, which alleged that the prisoner, in July 1848, married Eliza Goodman in a Wesleyan chapel duly licensed for marriages, and afterwards and in her lifetime married E. Outley, a witness proved that he was present at the first marriage at the Wesleyan chapel at Dunstable, in the presence of the registrar, and signed the register as a witness, and that the parties lived together as man and wife for two or three years. A witness proved that a certificate of this marriage was examined by him with the register book, kept at the office of the superintendent registrar of the district of Luton, within which Dunstable was, and that it was correct, and that it was signed by the superintendent registrar. This certificate contained a copy of the register, which the registrar certified to be correct. The witness also proved that he examined another certificate with the register book at the office of the superintendent registrar, and that it was correctly extracted, and was signed by the superintendent registrar in his presence. (h) The witness also proved that another document was signed in his presence by the superintendent registrar, and that he examined it with the register at his office, and found it was correctly extracted. (i) The reception of these documents was objected to, on the ground that certificates were not admissible to prove a marriage in a Wesleyan chapel, or that it was a place in which a marriage could be legally solemnized, or that, if admissible, they must be authenticated by the official seal of the registrar, and not under hand only. But the documents were admitted, and the prisoner convicted; and it was held that the conviction was right, upon the ground that, independently of the two last-mentioned documents, there was primâ facie evidence that the chapel was duly registered, and was therefore a place in which marriages might be legally solemnized. The presence of the registrar at the marriage, the fact of the ceremony taking place, and the entry in the registrar's book, aided, as they were, by the presumption omnia rite esse acta, afforded primâ facie evidence that the chapel was a duly registered place, in which marriages might be legally celebrated (h) So where on an indictment for bigamy the prisoner was shown to have been secondly married at a Wesleyan chapel not registered under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 36, in June 1857, and this marriage was proved by the registrar, who produced the certificate; it was objected that there was no proof of the second marriage, or that it was invalid, having taken place in an unlicensed chapel; but Wightman, J., overruled the objections. (l)

Where a woman in the lifetime of her first husband married a widower, who had been her sister's husband, which would have been a void marriage under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 52, s. 2, (m) even had the woman's first husband been dead, it was held that the validity of the second marriage did not affect the question. It is the appearing to contract a second marriage, and the going through the ceremony, which constitutes the crime of bigamy, otherwise it could never exist in ordinary cases; as a previous marriage always renders null and void a marriage that is celebrated afterwards by either of the parties during the lifetime of the other. Whether, therefore, the marriage of the two prisoners was or was not in itself prohibited, and therefore null and void, does not signify; for the woman having a husband then alive, has committed the crime of bigamy by doing all that in her lay by entering into marriage with another man. (n)

A marriage celebrated by banns, in a chapel erected after the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, was passed, and not upon the site of any ancient church or chapel, was held to be void, although marriages had been de facto frequently celebrated there; the words of the statute 'in which chapel banns have been usually published' being held clearly to mean chapels existing at the time it was passed. (o) But as soon as this determination was known, the 21 Geo. 3, c. 53, was passed, making valid all marriages which had been celebrated in any parish church or public chapel, erected since the passing of the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, and consecrated, and providing that the registers of such marriages should be received as evidence. The fourth section enacted, that the registers of marriages thereby made valid should, within twenty days after the 1st of August, 1781, be removed to the church of the parish in which such chapel should be situated; or, if it should be situated in an extra-parochial place, to the parish church next adjoining, to be kept with the registers of such parish. These provisions were extended by the 44 Geo. 3, c. 77, and the 48 Geo. 3, c. 127, to marriages celebrated in such chapels before the 23rd August, 1808; and the registers of such marriages are in like manner to be removed to parish churches, and transmitted to the bishop. The 6 Geo. 4, c. 92, recites, that since the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, and the 44 Geo. 3, c. 77, divers churches and chapels had been erected in England, Wales, and Berwick-upon-Tweed, which had been duly consecrated, and divers marriages had been solemnized therein since the passing of the 44 Geo. 3, c. 77; but by reason that in such churches and chapels banns of matrimony had not usually been published, before or at the time of passing the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, nor any authority obtained for solemnizing marriages therein, under the provisions of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, such marriages had been or might be deemed to be void; and then enacts, that all marriages already solemnized in any church or public chapel in England, Wales, and Berwick-upon-Tweed, erected since the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, and consecrated, shall be as good and valid in law as if such marriages had been solemnized in parish churches or public chapels, having chapelries annexed, and wherein banns had usually been published before or at the time of passing the 26 Geo. 2. By sec. 2, it shall be lawful for marriages to be in future solemnized in all churches and chapels erected since the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, and consecrated, 'in which churches and chapels it has been customary and usual, before the passing of this Act, to solemnize marriages;' and that all marriages hereinafter (p) solemnized therein shall be as good and valid as if they had been solemnized in parish churches, &c., wherein banns had usually been published before or at the time of passing the 26 Geo. 2. And the registers of marriages solemnized in the churches or chapels, by the 6 Geo. 4, enacted to be valid in law, or copies thereof, are to be received as evidence, in the same manner as the registers of marriages in parish churches, &c., in which banns were usually published before or at the time of the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, or copies thereof, are received; but liable to the same objections as would be available to exclude the latter from being received. (q) But such registers of marriages, solemnized in any public chapel, and made valid by the 6 Geo. 4, c. 92, are, within three months from the passing of the Act, to be removed to the parish church of the parish in which such chapel is situated; and if it be situated in an extra-parochial place, then to the parish church next adjoining, to be kept with the marriage registers of such parish, and in like manner as parish registers are directed to be kept by the 26 Geo. 2. (r)

the 26 Geo. 2,
c. 33.

Where a marriage was solemnized in a chapel, there must be some evidence given that banns were usually published there before the passing of the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33; but it was primâ facie sufficient for that purpose to produce an old register of marriages solemnized in the chapel before that Act, and a regular register of banns published there since, and to prove that within the recollection of witnesses banns had been published and marriages solemnized in it from time to time of late years. (s) But where on an indictment for bigamy it appeared that the first marriage was celebrated at the chapel of Great Barr, which was a chapel in the parish of Aldridge, in the year 1843, and that marriages had been solemnized there for the last twenty years, but no register was produced, nor any further evidence given as to the celebration of marriages or publication of banns there; Platt, B., held the evidence insufficient, as it was necessary to show either that the chapel was one in which banns had been usually published before the 26 Geo. 3, c. 33, or that the chapel was built and consecrated after that Act, and before the 6 Geo. 4, c. 92. (t)

By the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, s. 15, an Act to make better provision for the spiritual care of populous parishes, where any church or chapel has been consecrated as the church or chapel of any district constituted under the Act, such district is to be a new parish for ecclesiastical purposes, and 'it shall be lawful to publish banns of matrimony in such church, and according to the laws and canons in force in this realm to solemnize therein marriages;' and the several laws relating to the publication of banns and the performance of marriages and the registering thereof, shall apply to the church of such new parish, and to the perpetual curate thereof. And by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, s. 10, an Act for amending the Church Building Acts, banns of marriage may be published and marriages performed in the church of every consolidated chapelry formed in the manner therein mentioned.

Marriages in certain chapels rendered valid.

The 14 & 15 Vict. c. 97, s. 25, enacts that, where by error and without fraud banns had been published or marriages solemnized, in the church of any parish or district in which they could not lawfully be published or solemnized, the banns already (7th August, 1851) published and marriages already solemnized, shall not be questioned by reason thereof, except where some suit was pending.

The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 16, s. 4, rendered valid all banns published and all marriages solemnized before the 17th of May, 1861, in churches and chapels which had been duly consecrated, but in which banns could not legally be published nor marriages by law be solemnized; but the Act is not prospective. ings where such decision is made; and sec. 4 provides that omissions to authorize marriages in chapels may be supplied by a supplemental order, &c.

the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, but not certified as required by any Act.

The 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, and 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, only extend to that part of the United Kingdom called England^(w) With respect to marriages in Scotland, though the point was formerly much doubted,^(x) it appears to have been afterwards settled that where minors domiciled in England withdrew themselves into Scotland, or places beyond the seas, for the purpose of evading the Marriage Act, their marriage under such circumstances was nevertheless valid.^(y) In a late case, a writer to the signet proved that, according to the law of Scotland, marriage is a civil contract solemnly and deliberately entered into, and as if the parties had a serious intention of living together as man and wife. The assent of both parties must, therefore, be very distinctly and clearly proved to have been given, in order to render the contract a valid one. It is not necessary to the validity of such contract, that the parties should afterwards live together as man and wife; but the fact of their afterwards living together as man and wife will operate to explain ambiguous words, if there be such in the contract itself. Where, therefore, the second marriage took place at Gretna Green, and upon the whole evidence the assent of the second wife was not 'distinctly and clearly proved,' and, though the parties had lived together afterwards, the evidence tended rather to show that they were living together in a state of concubinage, inasmuch as the prisoner still continued to address her by her maiden name, Alderson, B., directed the jury to find the prisoner not guilty.^(z) And where, on an indictment for bigamy, to prove the second marriage in Scotland, a witness stated that she (being the sister of the second wife) was present at a ceremony performed by a minister of a congregation, but whether of the Kirk she did not know, in her private house in Edinburgh; that she herself was married in the same way, and that parties were always married in Scotland in private houses; that the prisoner and her sister lived together in her house as man and wife for a few days after the ceremony; and the jury found the prisoner guilty; upon the question being reserved whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict, or whether some witness, conversant with the law of Scotland, should not have been called upon to say whether the facts proved constituted a valid marriage according to that law; it was held that some such witness ought to have been called, and that, even supposing that the witness had been a competent witness for such a matter, her evidence did not prove a marriage in fact.^(a)

Dent*, 1 C. & K. 97. See Lapsley v. Grierson, 1 H. L. C. 498, that illicit cohabitation in Scotland begun in the lifetime of a husband, and continued after his death,

In the case of a marriage in a very distant place, it appears to be sufficient to show that it was performed according to the rites and custom of the country in which it was celebrated. Where a soldier on service with the British army in St. Domingo, in 1796, being desirous of marrying the widow of another soldier who had died there in the service, the parties went to a chapel in the town, and the ceremony was there performed by a person appearing and officiating as a priest; the service being in French, but interpreted into English by a person who officiated as clerk, and understood at the time by the woman to be the marriage service of the Church of England. This was held sufficient evidence, after eleven years' cohabitation, that the marriage was properly celebrated, although the woman stated that she did not know that the person officiating was a priest. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in delivering his opinion, considered the case, first, as a marriage celebrated in a place where the law of England prevailed (supposing, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the law of England, ecclesiastical and civil, was recognized by subjects of England in a place occupied by the king's troops, who would impliedly carry that law with them), and held that it would be a good marriage by that law: for it would have been a good marriage in this country before the Marriage Act, and consequently would be so now in a foreign colony, to which that Act does not extend. In the second place, he considered it upon the supposition that the law of England had not been carried to St. Domingo by the king's forces, nor was obligatory upon them in this particular; and held that the facts stated would be evidence of a good marriage according to the law of that country, whatever it might be; and that upon such facts every presumption was to be made in favour of the validity of the marriage. (b)

St. Domingo.

Where a person was married at her father's house, in Ireland, in 1799, in the presence of the friends of both families, by a clergyman of the Church of England, who had been curate of the parish for eighteen years; the parish church was standing, but persons of respectability were usually married at their own houses; the parties lived together for several years following as man and wife. Upon objection to the validity of this marriage, Best, C. J., said, I know of no law which says that celebration in a church is essential to the validity of a marriage in Ireland. The English Marriage Act does not apply, and I am aware of no Irish law which takes marriages performed in that country out of the rules which prevailed in this before the passing of that Act. Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (c) has placed it beyond a doubt that a marriage so celebrated as this has been would have been held valid in this country before the existence of that statute. (d) So

There the marriage was solemnized in Ireland, under a license from the Archbishop of Dublin, authorizing the clergyman to whom it was directed to marry the parties, at the usual canonical time and place; the ceremony was performed by the curate of the clergyman to whom the license was directed, in a where in support of a plea of coverture it was proved that Mrs. Quicke married Mr. Quicke at the house of the Rev. F. M'Guire, near Dublin, in 1842, and Mr. M'Guire's widow produced his letters of orders showing that he had been ordained deacon and priest by bishops of the Established Church, and also proved that when persons were married at their house, her husband always made an entry in a register book, which she produced, and also gave a certificate of the marriage to the persons married; and the register contained an entry of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Quicke, and Mrs. Quicke proved that she married Mr. Quicke as before mentioned, and produced the certificate given to her by Mr. M'Guire; Parke, B., held that the certificate was admissible as a part of the transaction; but not the register; and that the marriage was valid; for although it was not celebrated in a church, it was a valid marriage at common law before the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 81. (e)

Where a woman, being a Roman Catholic, and a man, being a Protestant, went in 1826 before Mr. Wood, a clergyman residing in Dublin, who, in his private house, read to them the marriage ceremony, and in the course of it asked her whether she would be the wife of the man, and asked him whether he would be her husband, to which question both of them answered, 'I will.' Wood was reputed to be a clergyman of the Established Church, and a document purporting to be letters of orders signed and sealed by W. late Archbishop of Tuam, dated in 1799, whereby the archbishop certified that he had ordained Wood a priest, and which letters were found among Wood's papers at the time of his death in July 1829, was admitted without proof of the handwriting or seal of the archbishop as being more than thirty years old. It was held that this document was properly received in evidence, being above thirty years old: if it had been only signed there could have been no question as to its admissibility, but it was, in fact, also sealed; but although an archbishop is a corporation sole for many purposes, yet such a certificate has no relation to his corporate character, and the seal must be considered as the seal of the natural person, and not of the corporation; and consequently that there was sufficient evidence of the marriage. Marriage by a dissenting teacher in a private room in Ireland.

In a case at the Old Bailey, a question was made, whether a marriage of a dissenter in Ireland, when performed by a dissenting minister in a private room, was valid. It was contended, on behalf of the prisoner, who was indicted for bigamy, that the marriage was illegal from the clandestine manner in which it was celebrated; and several Irish statutes were cited, from which it was argued that the marriage of dissenters in Ireland ought at least to be in the face of the congregation, and not in a private room. But the recorder is said to have been clearly of opinion that this marriage was valid, on the ground that as, before the Marriage Act, a marriage might have been celebrated in England in a house, and it was only made necessary, by the enactment of private house, and after the canonical hour. Bayley, J., after consulting Holroyd, J., thought that the non-compliance with the license, in respect of the place in which the ceremony was performed, rendered the marriage void.

positive law, to celebrate it in a church, some law should be shown requiring dissenters to be married in a church, or in the face of the congregation, in Ireland, before this marriage could be pronounced to be illegal: whereas one of the Irish statutes, 21 & 22 Geo. 3, c. 25, (g) enacted, that all marriages between Protestant dissenters, celebrated by a Protestant dissenting teacher should be good, without saying at what place they should be celebrated. (h)

We have seen that a marriage by a Presbyterian minister in Ireland was held void. (i) But the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 113, s. 1, renders all marriages celebrated in Ireland before the 12th August, 1842, by Presbyterian or other Protestant ministers or teachers, or those who at the time of such marriages had been such, of the same force as if they had been celebrated by clergymen of the united Church of England and Ireland. (k) The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 39, renders all similar marriages after the passing of the preceding Act, and before the passing of that Act, 28th July, 1843, valid. And the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 81, s. 83, contains a similar provision as to such marriages between the passing of the preceding Act and that Act, and by sec. 4 provides that marriages between parties both or either of whom are Presbyterians, may be solemnized, according to the forms used by Presbyterians, in certified meeting-houses.

A marriage celebrated in Ireland between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant, by a Roman Catholic priest, is void. The prisoner was charged with bigamy, and the first marriage was proved to have been in Ireland, by a Roman Catholic priest, but the prisoner insisted that it was void in point of law, as he was a Protestant at the time of the marriage, and the woman a Roman Catholic; the only evidence to prove that he was a Catholic was, that on several occasions prior to the first marriage, he had attended mass: Patteson, J., told the jury, that if they should be of opinion that the prisoner was a Roman Catholic when the first marriage took place, they must find him guilty; but that if they should be of opinion that he was a Protestant, they must acquit him. (l) But where the first marriage took place at Burton-on-Trent, and the second in Ireland, at the house of the Rev. W. O'Sullivan, a Roman Catholic priest, as was usual with the marriages

(g) And see 11 Geo. 2, c. 10. By 32 Geo. 3, c. 21, s. 12, Protestants may be married to Roman Catholics by clergymen of the Established Church; but sec. 13 contains a proviso that the Act shall not authorise Protestant dissenting ministers or Popish priests to celebrate marriage between Protestants of the Established Church and Roman Catholics. The clause, however, does not enact that such a marriage celebrated by a Protestant dissenting teacher shall be void. Such a marriage, celebrated by a Popish priest, would be void by 19 Geo. 2, c. 13 (Irish); and the 33 Geo. 3, c. 21, s. 12, only authorizes Popish priests to celebrate marriage between a Protestant and a Papist, where such Protestant and Papist have been first married by a Protestant clergyman. of Roman Catholics in Ireland: the woman was a Roman Catholic, and before the commencement of the marriage service Mr. O'Sullivan asked the prisoner if he was a Roman Catholic, and he said he was: a part of the ceremony was in Latin, and the remainder in English: the priest having asked the prisoner if he would take the woman as his wife, and having asked the woman if she would take the prisoner as her husband, and each of them having answered in the affirmative, he pronounced them married; it was held that the prisoner having at the time of the marriage held himself out to be a Roman Catholic, it was a good marriage as against him, and that he could not set up his protestation as a defence to an indictment for bigamy, and that there was sufficient evidence of the marriage in Ireland. With respect to the marriage of minors in Ireland, the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 11 (Irish), contains some provisions.

A marriage by license, in Ireland, where one of the parties was under age at the time, and there was no consent of the father, was not absolutely void, but only voidable within one year, under the 9 Geo. 2, c. 11, and if no proceedings were taken within the year to avoid the marriage, it was binding, and the party, if he married again (during the life of his wife) might be properly convicted of bigamy. Irish Marriage Acts.

The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 81, which passed on the 9th August, 1844, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 72, contain numerous provisions for the celebration and registration of marriages in Ireland.

A marriage

A marriage, however, celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest between two Protestants is still illegal, and renders the person celebrating it liable to be indicted for felony. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 81, leaves untouched the rights of the Roman Catholic clergy where the marriage would have been previously legal, and the exemption in that Act from penalties is only in relation to marriages which may now be lawfully celebrated. (n) Rex v. Jacobs, R. & M. C. C. R. 140. But since the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 81, s. 32, proof of the consent of parents, &c., is unnecessary.

(o) Reg. v. Taggart, 2 Cox C. C. 50. In delivering judgment, Blackburne, C. J., said, originally, a marriage celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest between two Protestants, or between a Protestant and a Roman Catholic was valid; then came the Acts 12 Geo. 1, c. 3 (I.), 23 Geo. 2, c. 10 (I.), and 33 Geo. 3, c. 21 (I.), under which a party celebrating such a marriage was made liable to the penalty of death, and by the latter statute to a fine of £500; and besides the 19 Geo. 2, c. 13 (I.), made the marriage itself absolutely void. Then came the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 102; by it all the Acts imposing penalties (i.e., the three first Acts) were repealed, but the ceremony remained an invalid marriage, as it was before; i.e., by the 19 Geo. 2, c. 13. See 2 Hayes Dig. C. L. 552, and the cases there mentioned.

chaplain or officer, or other person, officiating under the orders of the commanding officer of a British army serving abroad: and then enacts, that 'all such marriages shall be deemed and held to be as valid in law as if the same had been solemnized within his Majesty's dominions, with a due observance of all forms required by law.' But there is a proviso that this Act shall not confirm, or impair, or affect the validity of any marriages solemnized beyond the seas, save and except such as are solemnized as herein specified and recited. (q)

The 12 & 13 Vict. c. 68, which passed on the 28th of July, 1849, renders valid 'all marriages (both or one of the parties thereto being subjects or a subject of this realm) which shall be solemnized in the manner in that Act provided in any foreign country or place where there shall be a British consul duly authorized to act in such foreign country or place under that Act,' and contains many provisions as to the manner of performing such marriages before British consuls. (r)

Certain marriages of British subjects are legalized in Mexico by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 88; in Moscow, Tahiti, and Ningpo by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 46; at Lisbon, by the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 64; and in the Ionian Islands by the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 86; and provision is made for the transmission to the registrar general of certificates of these marriages, &c.

The 58 Geo. 4, c. 84, renders marriages solemnized in India by ministers of the Church of Scotland before the 31st December, 1818, valid; and the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 40, regulates marriages in India, after the 1st January, 1852, or such other day as the Governor General shall direct, where one or both of the parties is or are a person or persons professing the Christian religion.

Marriages in the colony and dependencies of Newfoundland are especially regulated by the statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 68, which repeals a former statute, 57 Geo. 3, c. 51, upon the same subject.

In an action for criminal conversation the marriage of the plaintiff and his wife, who were both Quakers, had been performed according to the ceremonies of the sect, by a public declaration of the parties at a monthly meeting of the society, of their becoming man and wife, and a certificate to that effect entered in a register, signed by the parties and by several subscribing witnesses. The register was produced and proved by one of the witnesses, and a member of the society proved the forms observed to be those usually considered as necessary to marriage among Quakers. (s)

It seems that in order to prove a Jewish marriage, the marriage contract must be proved. Where two witnesses were called, who swore that they were present in the Jewish synagogue when a marriage took place, it was insisted that what took place in the synagogue was merely a ratification of a previous written contract, and as that contract was essential to the validity of the marriage it ought to be produced and proved; and the contract, in the Hebrew tongue, was accordingly put in and proved. (t) So a French marriages. The law of France as to marriage may be proved by the production of a book, purporting to contain the code of France, and proved by oral testimony of a witness acquainted with the law of France, to contain the law of France. The articles of the law of France, which prescribe the forms essential to marriage, do not declare a marriage void for nonobservance of those forms, but parol evidence is admissible to show that, by the law of France, a marriage in fact, without observance of the requisites prescribed by the articles, is void. (v)

The marriage of lunatics void. It was formerly held that if an idiot contracted matrimony, it was good and should bind him: but modern resolutions appear to have proceeded upon the more reasonable doctrine of the civil law, by determining that the marriage of a lunatic, not being in a lucid interval, is absolutely void. And as it might be difficult to prove the exact state of the mind of the party at the actual celebration of the nuptials, the 15 Geo. 2, c. 30, has provided that if persons found lunatics under a commission, or committed to the care of trustees by any Act of Parliament, marry before they are declared of sound mind by the Lord Chancellor, or the majority of such trustees, the marriage shall be totally void. (w)

Upon indictments for bigamy it is not sufficient to prove a marriage by acknowledgment, cohabitation, and reputation; but it is necessary to prove what the courts call a marriage in fact, that is an actual marriage. (x) Therefore either some person present at the marriage must be called, or the original register, or an examined copy of it, be produced. (y) The 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 28, requires that marriages shall be solemnized in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, besides the minister who shall celebrate the same, and the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 86, s. 31, that it shall be registered in duplicate according to the form in the schedule, and that each entry shall be signed by the minister and parties married, and attested by two witnesses. But, upon a provision nearly similar in the former Marriage Act, it was held not to be necessary to call one of the subscribing witnesses to the register in order to prove the identity of the persons married; but that the register, or the copy of it, being produced, any evidence which satisfied the jury as to the identity of the parties was sufficient: as if their handwriting to the register were proved; or that bell-ringers were paid by them for ringing for the wedding, or the like. (z) And it was held that if the marriage were proved by a person present at it, it was not necessary to prove the registration, or license, or banns. The prisoner was indicted for marrying Ann Epton, whilst Jane, his former wife, was living; each marriage was proved by a witness who was present at the ceremony; and it appeared that at the first marriage the prisoner went by the name of Allison, and at the second by the name of Wilkinson. Chambre, J., doubted whether the evidence was sufficient without proof of the registration of either marriage, or of any license, or publication of banns; but the judges held that it was. (a)

Upon an indictment for bigamy it was proved on the part of the prisoner that her first husband, before he married her, had been in Canada, and that he was absent for about two years, and when he returned he said he had brought his wife with him, and a lady accompanied him, whom he treated as his wife, and every one else regarded her in that capacity; she had been heard of as being alive after the prisoner's first marriage; and thereupon Crompton, J., interposed, and said that there was evidence of a prior marriage, and, although there might be some technical difficulty in proving the marriage in Canada, still if there was reasonable doubt of the fact, the prisoner ought to be acquitted, and the jury said it was unnecessary to hear any more evidence. (b)

But it is sufficient for him.

The second wife must be properly described in the indictment, and if she be described as a widow, when, in fact, she was not so, and had never been represented or reputed to be so, the variance will be fatal. The prisoner was indicted for marrying E. Chant, widow, E. Rowe, his wife, being then alive; it appeared that E. Chant was, in fact and by reputation, a single woman; it was objected that she was improperly described in the indictment as a widow, and upon a case reserved the judges were unanimously of opinion that the misdescription was fatal, though it was not necessary to have stated more than the name of the party. (c) So where, on an indictment for bigamy describing the first wife as Ann Gooding, an examined copy of the certificate (d) of the marriage of the prisoner and Sarah Ann Gooding was put in, and there was no evidence to explain the difference in the names: Maule, J., directed an acquittal. (e)

The name of the wife must be proved as charged.

The 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 86 (an Act for registering births, marriages, and deaths in England), by sec. 38, enacts that all certified copies of entries purporting to be sealed or stamped with the seal of the register-office, shall be received as evidence of the birth, death, or marriage to which the same relates, without any further or other proof of such entry; and no certified copy purporting to be given in the said office shall be of any force or effect, which is not sealed or stamped as aforesaid. (f)

How far the acknowledgment of the defendant upon the subject of his marriage is sufficient evidence of the fact may admit of some doubt. In one case it was held, that proof of the prisoner's cohabiting with and acknowledging himself married to a former wife then living, such assertion being backed by his producing to the witness a copy of a proceeding in a Scotch court against him and his wife for having contracted the marriage improperly (the marriage, however, being still good according to that law) was sufficient evidence of the first marriage. The point being reserved, all the judges who were present held the conviction proper. Two of them observed that this did not rest upon cohabitation and bare acknowledgment, for the defendant had backed his assertion by the production of the copy of the proceeding; but some of the judges thought that the acknowledgment alone would have been sufficient, and that the paper produced in evidence was only a confirmation of such acknowledgment. (g) So where it was proved that the prisoner being charged with bigamy made a statement before a justice, in which he expressly declared that he had married his first wife, who was then present; Erskine, J., left the case to the jury, observing, that this was not an incautious statement made without due attention, but that the prisoner's mind was directed to the very point by the charge made against him. (h)

The prisoner's declarations deliberately made of a prior marriage in a foreign country are evidence of a legal marriage there.

So where upon an indictment for bigamy it appeared that the prisoner returned from America with a woman described in the indictment as Mary Carlisle, with whom he lived as his wife for some years afterwards; and that soon after his return he told her sister that he had been married to Mary Carlisle at New York by a Presbyterian minister, and he subsequently caused the bellman at Oldham to give public notice, which he did, that no one was to give credit to 'Mary, the wife of John Newton;' and some time afterwards Mary Newton, describing herself as his wife, complained to a magistrate of his having ill-treated her, and the prisoner attended before the magistrate, and did not deny the alleged marriage, but said he could no longer live with her on account of her jealousy, and consented to allow her eight shillings a week; Wightman, J., after consulting Cresswell, J., told the jury that the question was, whether they were satisfied by the statements made by the prisoner on the various occasions referred to that he had been married to Mary Carlisle in America, and that such marriage was a valid one according to the law of that country. The jury were to say whether, as against the prisoner, it might not be taken, on the faith of his own repeated declarations, that the marriage had been a valid one according to the law in force at New York. That declarations lightly or hastily made were entitled

C. c. 12, s. 10, pp. 470, 471; where see some remarks as to the admission of a bare acknowledgment in evidence in a case of this nature. That it may be difficult to say that it is not evidence to go to a jury; but that it must be admitted that it may under circumstances be entitled to little or no weight; for such acknowledgments made without consideration of the consequences, and palpably for other purposes at the time, are scarcely deserving of that name in the sense in which acknowledgments are received as evidence; more especially if made before the second marriage, or upon occasions when in truth they cannot be said to be to the party's own prejudice, nor so conceived by him at the time.

(h) Rex v. Dennis Upton, Gloucester Spr. Ass. 1839. It seems quite clear that this is the proper course on the general principle that everything which a prisoner says against himself is proper for the consideration of the jury, who are to ascribe such weight to it as it may appear to them to deserve. C. S. G. In Dickinson v. Coward, 1 B. & A. 679, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, 'I take it to be quite clear that any recognition of a person standing in a given relation to others is prima facie evidence against the person making such recognition that such relation exists. If, indeed, it were made in a loose conversation, I should consider the evidence but very slight.' See also 2 Stark. Evid. 251, 2nd edit.

to very little weight in such a case; but what the prisoner said deliberately, and when it was obviously his interest to deny the marriage, if he did not know it to be a valid one, was undoubtedly evidence entitled to the very serious consideration of the jury. (i)

But where, on an indictment for bigamy, it appeared that the prisoner went to a policeman, stating that he wanted to give himself up on a charge of felony, and that he had married two wives, both of whom were then with him, and that he could have no peace or quiet with them, so he went to the police-office as a refuge; he said that he had been married to the first wife thirty-two years ago by the parish priest of Leitrim, in the county of Galway, and had subsequently, in 1837, married Catherine O'Bryan, at the parish of Ashton-under-Lyne; and after he was in custody he signed a written statement in which he asserted the same facts: Pollock, C. B., said there must be some evidence of the first marriage beyond the mere admission of the prisoner, who might for a purpose have stated an untruth. There was some evidence of the first marriage, but it was not enough. (k)

But an admission made by a prisoner for some ulterior purpose will not suffice.

After proof of the first marriage the second wife may be a witness; but it is clear that the first and true wife cannot be admitted to give evidence against her husband. (l)

The true wife cannot be a witness.

The prisoner was indicted for having married A. Walker, his first wife, A. Armstrong, being alive: the prisoner's first marriage with A. Armstrong was proved. The prisoner's defence was, that the first marriage was void, as A. Armstrong had a husband living at the time, and he proposed to call A. Armstrong to prove that fact; it was objected to her competency, that the fact of her marriage with the prisoner having been proved, she must be taken to be his lawful wife. Alderson, B., was at first inclined to think that she might be examined simply to the fact of her being the wife or not of the prisoner; but after conferring with Williams, J., he determined not to receive her evidence, but to reserve the point. (m) But where a woman, called as a witness against a

(i) Reg. v. Newton, 2 M. & Rob. 503. S. C. as Reg. v. Simmonsto 1 C. & K. 164. According to the latter report the difficulty felt by Wightman, J., was that it was not a simple admission of a marriage, but of a marriage by a Presbyterian minister in New York, which would not have been a good marriage in England before the marriage Act; and there was no evidence that it was a good marriage by the law of New York.

(m) Peat's case, 2 Lewin, 288. The prisoner was acquitted. The first impression of the very learned Baron seems to have been the correct one. The only ground on which the witness could be rejected was, that she was the lawful wife of the prisoner; for 'the general rule does not extend to a wife de facto, but not de jure.' 2 Stark. Evid. 402, (2nd edit). In Wells v. Fletcher, 5 C. & P. 12. S. C., 1 M. & Rob. 99, a woman called for the defendant on examination on the voire dire, said she had been married to the plaintiff, and on re-examination that she was married to another person previously; but, not seeing him for thirty years, she thought he was dead, and therefore married the plaintiff, but afterwards found that her first husband was living; and Patteson, J., held that the witness was competent, as the second marriage was a nullity. If Peat's case had been an indictment for larceny, and the witness called for the prisoner had proved her marriage to him on the voire dire, Wells v. Fletcher shows that she might have been rendered competent by proving her previous marriage, and it is difficult to see how proof by other evidence that she had married the prisoner, whether such evidence were given before or after she was called, could render her incompetent; for her evidence would not be inconsistent with such evidence, as it

No presumption as to the time of the death of an absent person.

There is no presumption of law as to the death of a party, without reference to the accompanying circumstances, such, for instance, as the age or the health of the party, and the only question is, what inference may fairly be drawn from the evidence. The presumption of innocence cannot shut out the presumption arising from the fact, that the party was alive within a short time of the second marriage. A pauper married E. Meadows, in 1821, who afterwards went abroad, and several letters had been received from her dated from Van Dieman's Land, and one in her handwriting, dated Hobart Town, 17th March, 1831; the pauper married again on the 11th of April, 1831; it was held that the sessions were warranted in presuming that E. Meadows was alive at the time when the second marriage took place. (o)

Letters.

The fact of a letter being in the handwriting of a party and dated at a particular time, is evidence that the party was alive at that time. A daughter wrote to her father in America, and in about two months afterwards received a letter in reply in his handwriting, dated the 1st of May, 1836, it was held that this was evidence that he was then alive. (p)

Form of indictment.

An indictment for bigamy under the 35 Geo. 3, c. 57, s. 1 (now repealed), alleging that the prisoner married A., and afterwards feloniously married C., 'the said A., his former wife, being then alive,' sufficiently charged the offence, without also alleging that the prisoner was still married to A., when he married C.; for a divorce from A. was not to be presumed. (q) would admit the marriage with the prisoner, but show that it was void. Rex v. Bathwick, 2 B. & Ad. 639, shows that the competency of the wife does not depend upon the marshalling of the evidence, or the particular stage of the case in which she may be called; if, therefore, in Peat's case the witness had been called before her marriage with the prisoner had been proved, and she would have been competent to prove her previous marriage, it is difficult to see how her marriage with the prisoner having been proved before she was called could render her incompetent, and it certainly would operate hardly on a prisoner, if such were the case, for the prosecutor might in the course of his case prove the marriage of the witness with the prisoner, and the prisoner might have no one except the witness to prove the former marriage. It may be added that Lord Hale, vol. 1, p. 693, says, that a second wife is not so much as a wife de facto. C. S. G.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FOURTH.

OF LIBEL AND INDICTABLE SLANDER.

It appears to be well settled that publications blaspheming God, or turning the doctrines of the Christian religion into contempt and ridicule, may be made the subject of indictment; and it is now fully established, though some doubt seems formerly to have been entertained upon the subject, that such immodest and immoral publications as tend to corrupt the mind, and to destroy the love of decency, morality, and good order, are also offences at common law. (a) It is also a misdemeanor wantonly to defame or indecorously to calumniate that economy, order and constitution of things which make up the general system of the law and government of the country. (b) And it is especially criminal to degrade or calumniate the person and character of the sovereign, and the administration of his government by his officers and ministers of state, (c) or the administration of justice by his judges. (d) And the same policy which prohibits seditious comments on the King's conduct and government extends, on the same grounds, to similar reflections on the proceedings of the two houses of parliament. (e) Such publications also as tend to cause animosities between this country and any foreign state, by the personal abuse of the sovereign of such state, his ambassadors, or other public ministers, may be treated as libels. (f) With respect to libels upon individuals, they have been defined to be malicious defamations, expressed either in printing or writing, or by signs or pictures, tending either to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or the reputation of one who is alive, and thereby exposing him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule. (g)

Upon some of these subjects a publication by slander, or words spoken only, though not properly a libel, (h) may be the subject of criminal proceeding, as will be shown in the course of the chapter.

What publications in general are libellous.

Of slanderous words.

(a) See the cases collected in 2 Starkie on Libel, 155.

(b) Holt on Libel, 82.

(h) A libel is termed Libellus famosus seu infamatoria scriptura and has been usually treated of as scandal, written or expressed by symbols. Lamb. Sax. Law, 64. Bract. lib. 3, c. 36. 3 Inst. 174, 5 Co. 125. 1 Lord Raym. 416. 2 Salk. 417, 418. Libel may be said to be a technical word, deriving its meaning rather from its use than its etymology. 'There is no other name but that of libel applicable to the offence of libelling; and we know the offence specifically by that name, as we know the offences of horse-stealing, forgery, &c., by the names which the law has annexed to them.' By Lord Camden in Rex v. Wilkes, 2 Wils. 121.

Of the mode of expression.

A libel may be as well by descriptions and circumlocutions as in express terms, therefore scandal conveyed by way of allegory or irony amounts to a libel. As where a writing, in a taunting manner, reckoning up several acts of public charity done by a person, said, 'You will not play the Jew, nor the hypocrite,' and then proceeded, in a strain of ridicule, to insinuate that what the person did was owing to his vain glory. Or where a publication, pretending to recommend to a person the characters of several great men for his imitation, instead of taking notice of what great men are generally esteemed famous for, selected such qualities as their enemies accuse them of not possessing (as by proposing such a one to be imitated for his courage who was known to be a great statesman, but no soldier; and another to be imitated for his learning who was known to be a great general, but no scholar); such a publication being as well understood to mean only to upbraid the parties with the want of these qualities as if it had done so directly and expressly. (i) And, upon the same ground, not only an allegory, but a publication in hieroglyphics, or a rebus or anagram, which are still more difficult to be understood, may be a libel; and a court, notwithstanding its obscurity and perplexity, shall be allowed to judge of its meaning, as well as other persons. (k) So a libel may be by asking questions; for if a man insinuates a fact in asking a question; meaning thereby to assert it, it is the same thing as if he asserted it in terms. (l) And it is now well established that slanderous words must be understood by the Court in the same sense as the rest of mankind would ordinarily understand them. (m) Formerly it was the practice to say that words were to be taken in the more lenient sense; but that doctrine is now exploded: they are not to be taken in the more lenient or more severe sense, but in the sense which fairly belongs to them, and which they were intended to convey. (n)

Upon the same principles it has been resolved that a defamatory writing, expressing only one or two letters of a name, in such a manner that from what goes before, and follows after, it must needs be understood to signify a particular person, in the plain, obvious, and natural construction of the whole, and would be nonsense if strained to any other meaning, is as properly a libel as if it had expressed the whole name at large; for it brings the utmost contempt upon the law to suffer its justice to be eluded by such trifling evasions; and it is a ridiculous absurdity to say that a writing which is understood by every one of the meanest capacity cannot possibly be understood by a judge or jury. Rex v. Lambert and Perry, 2 Campb. 403. And in a case of libel, Rex v. Watson and others, 2 T. R. 206, Buller, J., said, 'Upon occasions of this sort I have never adopted any other rule than that which has been frequently repeated by Lord Mansfield to juries, desiring them to read the paper stated to be a libel as men of common understanding, and say whether in their minds it conveys the idea imputed.'

(o) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73, s. 5. Bac. Abr. tit. Libel (A) 3, where it is said in the marginal note that if an application is made for an information in a case of

An indictment lies for general imputations on a body of men, though no individuals be pointed out, because such writings have a tendency to inflame and disorder society, and are therefore within the cognizance of the law. (p) And scandal published of three or four persons is punishable at the complaint of one or more, or all of them. (q)

It appears to have been considered that the remedies by action and indictment for libels are co-extensive, and may be regarded as upon the same footing. (r)

Formerly, upon an indictment or criminal prosecution for a libel the party could not justify that its contents were true, or that the person upon whom it is made had a bad reputation. But the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, permits a defendant to plead to any indictment or information for a defamatory libel that the libellous matters are true, provided it was for the public benefit that such matters should be published. (s) The ground of the former rule, which still exists where no such plea is pleaded, is the public mischief, which libels are calculated to create in alienating the minds of the people from religion and good morals, rendering them hostile to the government and magistracy of the country; and, where particular individuals are attacked, in causing such irritation in their minds as may induce them to commit a breach of the public peace. The law, therefore, does not permit the defendant to give the truth of the libellous matter in justification; any attempt at which in the instances of libels against religion, morality, or the constitution, would be attended with consequences of the greatest absurdity; and, in the case of libels upon individuals, might be extremely unjust, and could never afford a substantial defence to the charge. A libel against an individual may consist in the exposure of some personal deformity, the actual existence of which would only show the greater malice in the defendant; and even if it contain charges of misconduct founded in fact, the publication will not be the less likely to produce a violation of the public tranquillity. It has been observed, that the greater appearance of truth there may be in any malicious invective, it is so much the more provoking; and that, in a settled state of government, the party grieved ought to complain, for every injury done to him, in the ordinary course of law, and not this kind, some friend to the party complaining should, by affidavit, state the having read the libel, and understanding and believing it to mean the party. In one case Lord Ellenborough, C. J., held, upon argument, that the declarations of spectators, while they looked at a libellous picture in an exhibition room, were evidence to show that the figures portrayed were meant to represent the parties stated to be libelled. Du Bost v. Beresford, 2 Campb. 512.

(q) Id. ibid. In Rex v. Benfield, 2 Burr. 980, it was held that an information lay against two for singing a libellous song on A. and B., which first abused A. and then B. And it was said that if the defendants had sung separate stanzas, the one reflecting on A. and the other on B., the offence would still have been entire. A libel upon one of a body of persons, without naming him, is a libel upon the whole, and may be so described; and where a paper is published equally reflecting upon a number of people, it reflects upon all; and readers, according to their different opinions, may apply it so. *Rex v. by any means to revenge himself by the odious proceeding of a libel. (t)

If a libel contain matters imputing to another a crime capable of being tried, evidence of the truth of those imputations is not admissible under a plea of not guilty. (u) But in one case, where evidence of the falsehood of the libel was adduced by the prosecutor as necessary to support the charge, and no objection was made to it, Lord Tenterden, C. J., although not free from doubts in his own mind, yet adverting to the particular nature of the libel, which was little more than a narrative of certain facts supposed to have taken place in one of the West India Islands, did not think himself warranted in interposing under the very peculiar circumstances of that case: and, having received evidence of the falsehood, he would have received evidence of the truth, if any such had been offered, on the part of the defendant. (v)

It is no defence that it was copied from some other work.

A party will not be excused by showing that the libel with which he is charged was copied from some other work, even though he may have stated it to be merely a copy, and disclosed the name of the original author at the time of its publication. Thus, where to a declaration for a libel the defendant pleaded that he had the libellous statement from another person, and at the time of publishing the libel he stated that the libel had been published to him by such other person, it was held that the plea was bad; for wrong is not to be justified, or even excused, by wrong: if a man receives a letter with authority from the author to publish it, the person receiving it will not be justified, if it contains libellous matter, in inserting it in a newspaper; no authority from a third person will defend a man against an action brought by a person who has suffered from an unlawful act. If the receiver of a letter publish it without authority, he is, from his own motion, the wilful circulator of slander. (w) So it is no defence to an action for oral slander for the defendant to show that he heard the slander from another, and named the person at the time, unless he also show that he believed it to be true, and uttered the slander on a justifiable occasion. This rule, however, may be dispensed with if the person libelled resides abroad, or if the imputations of the libel are general and indefinite, or if it is a charge against the prosecutor for language which he has held in Parliament. 4 Blac. Possibly, therefore, in such a case, evidence of the truth of such a statement by the production of the record, might afford an answer to a prosecution for libel.' Ibid. per Bayley, J., p. 147.

tion from being deemed libellous. A petition to the King to be relieved from doing what the King has directed the party to do, if bonâ fide and in respectful terms, is no libel, though it call in question the legality of the King's direction. James II. published a declaration of liberty of conscience and worship to all his subjects, dispensing with the oaths and tests prescribed by statutes 25 & 30 Car. II., and directed that it should be read two days in every church and chapel in the realm, and that the bishops should distribute it in their dioceses that it might be so read. The Archbishop of Canterbury and six bishops presented a petition to the King praying that he would not insist upon their distributing and reading it, principally because it was founded on such a dispensing power as had often been declared illegal in Parliament, and that they could not in prudence, honour, or conscience, so far make themselves parties to it as to distribute and publish it. This petition was treated as a libel: they were taken up and tried for it. The publication was proved; and Wright, C. J., and Allibone, J., thought it a libel: but Holloway and Powell, JJ., thought otherwise, there not being any ill intention of sedition in the bishops, and the object of their petition being to free themselves from blame in not complying with the King's command. The jury found them not guilty. (y)

It has been resolved that no false or scandalous matter contained in a petition to a committee of Parliament, or in articles of the peace exhibited to justices of peace, or in any other proceeding in a regular course of justice, will make the complaint amount to a libel; for it would be a great discouragement to suitors to subject them to public prosecution in respect of their applications to a court of justice. (z) Thus where the defendant, in a certain affidavit before the Court, had said that the plaintiff in a former affidavit against the defendant had sworn falsely, the Court held that this was not libellous; for in every dispute in a court of justice, where one by affidavit charges a thing and the other denies it, the charges must be contradictory, and there must be affirmation of falsehood. (a) No presentment of a grand jury can be a libel, not only because persons who are supposed to be returned without their own seeking, and are sworn to act impartially, shall be pre-

It is holden by some that no want of jurisdiction in the court to which the complaint shall be exhibited will make it a libel; because the mistake of the court is not imputable to the party, but to his counsel; but Hawkins says (1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73, s. 8), that if it manifestly appears that a prosecution is entirely false, malicious, and groundless, and commenced, not with a design to go through with it, but only to expose the defendant's character under the show of a legal proceeding, he cannot see any reason why such a mockery of public justice should not rather aggravate the offence than make it cease to be one. Upon this point Mr. Starkie, after referring to the several authorities, says, that it may be collected generally that no action can be maintained for anything said or otherwise published in the course of a judicial proceeding, whether criminal or civil; though for a malicious and groundless prosecution, an action, and perhaps an indictment, may be supported, founded on the whole proceeding. 1 Starkie on Libel, 254, 2nd edit.

sumed to have proper evidence for what they do, but also because it would be of the utmost ill consequence in any way to discourage them from making their inquiries with that freedom and readiness which the public good requires. (b) Where an action was brought against the president of a military court of inquiry for a libel contained in the minutes of such Court, which had been delivered by the defendant to the commander in chief and deposited in his office, it was held that these minutes were a privileged communication, and properly rejected when tendered at the trial in proof of the alleged libel; and also that a copy of them had been properly rejected. (c) And where a court-martial, after stating in their sentence the acquittal of an officer against whom a charge had been preferred, subjoined thereto a declaration of their opinion, that the charge was malicious and groundless, and that the conduct of the prosecutor in falsely calumniating the accused was highly injurious to the service, it was held that the president of the court-martial was not liable to an action for a libel for having delivered such sentence and declaration to the judge-advocate; and Mansfield, C. J., in delivering his opinion, said: 'If it appear that the charges are absolutely without foundation, is the president of the court-martial to remain perfectly silent on the conduct of the prosecutor, or can it be any offence for him to state that the charge is groundless and malicious?' (d)

of members of Parliament are privileged.

The members of the two houses of Parliament, by reason of their privilege, are not answerable at law for any personal reflections on individuals contained in speeches in their respective houses; for policy requires that those who are by the constitution appointed to provide for the safety and welfare of the public should, in the execution of their high functions, be wholly uninfluenced by private considerations. (e)

Thus the actual proceedings in courts of justice and in Parliament are exempted from being deemed libellous; it becomes important to inquire in the next place how far the same privilege will be extended to communications of those proceedings to the public, made with impartiality and correctness.

How far the publication of proceedings in courts of justice is allow-

It has always been held that a publication of the proceedings in a court of justice will not be protected unless it be a true and honest statement of those proceedings. (f) But provided it were of that character, the doctrine seems at one time to have been that it might be made to the full extent of stating what had actually taken place. (g) More recently, however, it has been said that it must not be taken for granted that the publication of every matter which passes in a court of justice, however truly represented, is, under all circumstances and with whatever motive published, justifiable; and that such doctrine must be taken with grains of allowance. (h) And Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, 'It often happens that circumstances necessary for the sake of public justice to be disclosed by a witness in a judicial inquiry are very distressing to the feelings of individuals on whom they reflect: and if such circumstances were afterwards wantonly published, I should hesitate to say that such unnecessary publication was not libellous merely because the matter had been given in evidence in a court of justice.' (i) In a subsequent case, not relating directly to this point, but to the publication of proceedings in Parliament, Bayley, J., said, 'It has been argued that the proceedings of courts of justice are open to publication. Against that, as an unqualified proposition, I enter my protest. Suppose an indictment for blasphemy, or a trial where indecent evidence was necessarily introduced; would every one be at liberty to poison the minds of the public, by circulating that which for the purposes of justice the Court is bound to hear? I should think not: and it is not true, therefore, that in all instances the proceedings of a court of justice may be published. Again, it may be said that counsel have a right, in pursuance of their instructions, and whilst the cause is going on, to endeavour to produce an effect by making such observations on the credit and character of parties and their witnesses as sometimes, when the cause is over, perhaps they are sorry for. But have they, therefore, or any person who hears them, a right afterwards to publish those observations? I have no hesitation in saying that, when the occasion ceased, the right also would cease; and that it would be no justification to plead that such a publication was a transcript of the counsel's speech.' (h) This doctrine was recognized and acted upon in a recent case. The defendant's husband had been convicted of publishing a blasphemous libel, after having in his defence at the trial used arguments and statements of a blasphemous and indecent description. His wife published the trial; and, upon showing cause against a rule for a criminal information, it was urged that she had a right to publish what actually took place in a court of justice: but the Court were clear she had not, if that statement contained anything defamatory, seditious, blasphemous, or indecent: and the rule was made absolute. (l) And where it is allowable to publish what passes in a court of justice, the party must publish the whole case, and not merely state the conclusion which he himself draws from the evidence. Thus, where the libel stated in the declaration purported to be a speech of counsel at a trial of the plaintiff on a criminal charge, and, after setting out the speech, said that a witness was called who proved all that had been stated by counsel, and that the defendant was immediately afterwards acquitted upon a defect in proving some matter of form; and the plea stated that in fact such a speech was made, and that the witness called proved all that had been so stated, but it did not set out the evidence or justify the truth of the charges made in the counsel's speech; it was holden that such plea was bad, inasmuch as a party could not be justified in publishing the result of evidence given in a court of justice, but must state the evidence itself. (m) And the party making the publication will not be justified, unless he confines himself to what actually passed in court. In a case where an action was brought for a libel concerning the plaintiff in his profession as an attorney, and the libel, as stated in the declaration, began, 'shameful conduct of an attorney,' and then proceeded to give an account of proceedings in a court of law which contained matter injurious to the plaintiff's professional character, and the defendant had pleaded that the supposed libel contained a true account of the proceedings in the court of law; it was holden (after verdict for the defendant) that the plea was bad, inasmuch as the words 'shameful conduct of an attorney' formed no part of the proceedings in the court of law, and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to judgment. (n) It is an established principle, upon which the privilege of publishing a report of any judicial proceedings is admitted to rest, that such report must be strictly confined to the actual proceedings in court, and must contain no defamatory observations or comments from any quarter whatever, in addition to what forms strictly and properly the legal proceedings. (o) A report of a charge made against the plaintiff at the Mansion-house, added, 'Mr. Hobler, the chief clerk, observed that it was exceedingly improper under any circumstances to obtain the signature of the complainant, a mere boy, to bills of exchange;' it was held that this was a substantive reflection on the character and conduct of the plaintiff, which was altogether unwarranted: it was not made in the course of any judicial proceeding by any one whose duty called upon him to make it; but was uttered by a person who, for this purpose, must be considered as an entire stranger. (p) If the report of what takes place in a court of justice contains only a fair account, the person who publishes it has only to prove that fact under the general issue, and he is entitled to entire impunity. It is not essential that every word of the evidence, of the speeches, and of what was said by the judge, should be inserted, if the report is substantially a fair and correct report of what took place in a court of justice. (q) The subsequent publication of a speech made by a counsel in the course of a cause containing observations injurious to the character of a party, attorney, or witness in the cause, is not lawful, because such publication is not required for the due administration of justice; (r) but no action will lie against a barrister for words spoken by him in a cause, which are pertinent to the matter in issue. (s) And an attorney acting as an advocate has the same privilege. (t) And a party is at liberty to publish a history of a trial, viz., of the facts of the case, and of the law of the case as applied to those facts. (u)

Proceedings before magistrates, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, with respect to summary convictions and orders, in which, after both parties are heard, a final judgment is given, are strictly of a judicial nature, and the trial and the judgment may lawfully be made the subject of a printed report, if that report be impartial and correct; (v) and the like privilege extends to the publication of proceedings taking place publicly before a magistrate on the preliminary investigation of a charge of an indictable offence, terminating in the discharge of the party charged, although there were several hearings, and separate publications as to each hearing; (w) but it has not yet been decided that the publication of such preliminary inquiries is lawful where they end in the case being sent for trial. (x) On the contrary, the publication of preliminary examinations before a magistrate, taken ex parte, have been held not to come within the principle by which the fair reports of proceedings in courts of justice are privileged. Such publications have a tendency to cause great mischief by perverting the public mind, and disturbing the course of justice; and, if they contain libellous matter, will be considered as highly criminal. (y) And the Court of King's Bench has granted a criminal information for publishing in a newspaper a statement of the evidence given before a coroner's jury, accompanied with comments; although the statement was correct, and the party had no malicious motive in the publication. (z) So the publication of proceedings before a commissioner of inquiry respecting corporations cannot be justified by showing that it is a true report of what occurred before the commissioner. So, a fair report in a newspaper of what takes place at a public meeting, if it contain matter defamatory of an individual, is not privileged. How far the publication of proceedings in Parliament is allowable.

Though the publication of a proceeding in Parliament will, in general, be considered as privileged and protected from being deemed libellous; (d) and the printing and delivering a petition to members of a committee of the House of Commons, being according to the order of proceedings of Parliament and their committees, has been held to be justifiable: (e) yet it may be doubted how far the circulation of a copy of a writing containing matter of an injurious tendency to the character of an individual, though published for the use of the members, is legitimate and exempted from prosecution. (f) And it is clear that the publication of the speech of a member of Parliament, if it contain matter of libel, is not protected, even though such publication be made by the member himself. In a case upon this subject, Lord Kenyon, C.J., observed, that if the words in question had been spoken in the House of Lords, and confined to its walls, the Court of King's Bench would have had no jurisdiction to call a member of that house before them, to answer for such words as an offence; but that the offence was the publication of them in the public papers, under the authority of the member, with his sanction, and at his expense: that a member of Parliament had certainly a right to publish his speech, but that his speech should not be made the vehicle of slander against any individual; if it were, it would be a libel. (g) And in a more recent case it was held, that a member of the House of Commons may be convicted upon an indictment for a libel, in publishing in a newspaper the report of a speech delivered by him in that house, if it contain libellous matter, although the publication be a correct report of such speech, and be made in consequence of an incorrect publication having appeared in that and other newspapers. (h) But a publication of a report of his speech by a member of the House of Commons, bonâ fide, addressed to his constituents, would be privileged. (i)

Stockdale v. Hansard.

It has recently been decided in a case, which underwent the most profound consideration, that it is no defence in law to an action for publishing a libel, that the defamatory matter is part of a document which was, by order of the House of Commons, laid before the House, and thereupon became part of the proceedings of the House, and which was afterwards, by orders of the House, printed and published by the defendant; and that the House of Commons had theretofore resolved, 'that the power of publishing such of its reports, votes, and proceedings, as it shall deem necessary or conducive to the public interests, is an essential incident to the constitutional functions of Parliament, more especially to the Commons' House of Parliament, as the representative portion of it.' (k)

In consequence of this decision the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 9, was passed, which by sec. 1, reciting, 'whereas it is essential to the due and effectual exercise and discharge of the functions and duties of Parliament, and to the promotion of wise legislation, that no obstructions or impediments should exist to the publication of such

Having treated generally of the publications which may be considered as libellous, it may be useful to refer to some of the particular points which have been holden, respecting publications:—1. Against the Christian religion. 2. Against morality. 3. Against the constitution. 4. Against the King. 5. Against the two Houses of Parliament. 6. Against the Government. 7. Against the magistrates and the administration of justice. 8. Against private individuals. And, 9, Against foreigners of distinction.

Of publications
against the Christian religion.

1. It has been before observed, (m) that blaspheming God, or turning the doctrines of the Christian religion into contempt and ridicule, is an indictable offence. At common law, all blasphemies against God, as denying His being or providence; and all contumelious reproaches of Jesus Christ; all profane scoffing at the Holy Scripture, or exposing any part thereof to contempt or ridicule; and also seditious words in derogation of the established religion; are considered as offences tending to subvert all religion and morality, and punishable by the temporal courts with fine and imprisonment, and also infamous corporal punishment, in the discretion of the court. (n)

this subject.

Some provisions have also been made upon this subject by statutes. The 1 Edw. 6, c. 1, (o) enacts, that persons reviling the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, by contemptuous words or otherwise, shall suffer imprisonment. The 1 Eliz. c. 2, (p) enacts, that if any minister shall speak anything in derogation of the Book of Common Prayer, he shall, if not beneficed, be imprisoned one year for the first offence, and for life for the second; and if he be beneficed, shall for the first offence be imprisoned six months and forfeit a year's value of his benefice; for the second, shall be deprived and suffer one year's imprisonment; and for the third, shall in like manner be deprived and suffer imprisonment for life. And that if any person whatsoever shall in plays, songs, or other open words, speak anything in derogation, depraving, or despising of the said book, or shall forcibly prevent the reading of it, or cause any other service to be read in its stead, he shall forfeit for the first offence 100 marks; for the second, 400; and for the third, shall forfeit all his goods and chattels, and suffer imprisonment for life. The 1 Will. 3, c. 18, s. 17, enacted, that whosoever should deny in his preaching or writing the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity, should lose all benefit of the Act for granting toleration. This section is now repealed by 53 Geo. 3, c. 160: but while it was in existence it was considered as operating to deprive the offender of the benefit therein mentioned, leaving the punishment of the offence as for a misdemeanor at common law. (q) The 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 32, enacted, that if any person, educated in or having made profession of the Christian religion, should, by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, deny any one of the Persons in the Holy Trinity to be God, (r) or should assert or maintain there are more gods than one, or should deny the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures to be of divine authority, he should upon the first offence be rendered incapable to hold any office or place of trust; and for the second be rendered incapable of bringing any action, being guardian, executor, legatee, or purchaser of lands, and should suffer three years' imprisonment without bail. (s) A person offending under this statute was held to be also indictable at common law. (t) And where a motion was made in arrest of judgment on an information for a blasphemous libel, on the ground that this statute had put an end to the common law offence: the Court were clear that it had not, considering that the provisions of the statute were cumulative. (u).

(p) Partly repealed by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 102, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59, but not so as to affect the provisions here mentioned.

Upon the trial of an information against the defendant for uttering expressions grossly blasphemous, Hale, C.J., observed, that such kind of wicked blasphemous words were not only an offence to God and religion, but a crime against the laws, state, and government, and therefore punishable in the Court of King's Bench. That to say religion is a cheat is to dissolve all those obligations whereby civil society is preserved; that Christianity is part of the laws of England, and therefore to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law. (v) In a case where a libel stated that Jesus Christ was an impostor, a murderer in principle, and a fanatic, a juryman asked whether a work denying the divinity of our Saviour was a libel; and Abbott, C.J., answered that a work speaking of Jesus Christ in the language here used was a libel; and on a motion for a new trial, on the ground that this was a wrong answer, the Court without difficulty held that the answer was right. (w)

To reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law.

Where the defendant had been convicted for publishing several blasphemous libels, in which the miracles of our Saviour were turned into ridicule and contempt, and his life and conversation calumniated, it was moved in arrest of judgment that this was not an offence within the cognizance of the temporal courts at common law; but the Court would not suffer the point to be argued, saying that the Christian religion, as established in this kingdom, is part of the law; and, therefore, that whatever derided

But though to write against Christianity in general is an offence at common law, the Court will not meddle with differences of opinion upon controverted points.

The dread of future punishment is one of the principal sanctions of the law.

Rational and dispassionate discussions are allowable.

Christianity derided the law, and consequently must be an offence against the law. (x) It was also moved in arrest of judgment, that as the intent of the book was only to show that the miracles of Jesus Christ were not to be taken in their literal sense, it could not be considered as attacking Christianity in general, but only as striking against one received proof of His being the Messiah; to which the Court said, that the attacking Christianity in the way in which it was attacked in this publication was destroying the very foundation of it; and that, though there were professions in the book that its design was to establish Christianity upon a true bottom by considering these narrations in Scripture as emblematical and prophetical, yet that such professions were not to be credited, and that the rule is allegatio contra factum non est admittenda. But the Court also said, that though to write against Christianity in general is clearly an offence at common law, they laid stress upon the word general, and did not intend to include disputes between learned men upon particular controverted points; and, in delivering the judgment of the Court, Raymond, C.J., said, 'I would have it taken notice of that we do not meddle with any differences of opinion, and that we interpose only where the very root of Christianity itself is struck at.' (y)

The doctrine of the Christian religion constituting part of the law of the land was recognized in a later case, where the judgment of the Court of King's Bench was pronounced upon a person convicted of having published a very impious and blasphemous libel, called Paine's Age of Reason. (z) Ashhurst, J., said, that although the Almighty did not require the aid of human tribunals to vindicate His precepts, it was, nevertheless, fit to show our abhorrence of such wicked doctrines as were not only an offence against God, but against all law and government, from their direct tendency to dissolve all the bonds and obligations of civil society; and that it was upon this ground that the Christian religion constituted part of the law of the land. That if the name of our Redeemer was suffered to be traduced, and His holy religion treated with contempt, the solemnity of an oath, on which the due administration of justice depended, would be destroyed, and the law be stripped of one of its principal sanctions, the dread of future punishments. (a)

Contumely and contempt are what no establishment can tolerate: but, on the other hand, it would not be proper to lay any restraint upon rational and dispassionate discussions of the rectitude and propriety of the established mode of worship. (b) A sensible writer upon the subject of libel says, as to this point—'that it may not be going too far to infer, from the principles and decisions, that no author or preacher who fairly and conscientiously

(z) This libel was of the worst kind, attacking the truth of the Old and New Testaments; arguing that there was no genuine revelation of the will of God existing in the world; and that reason was the only true faith which laid any obligations on the conduct of mankind. In other respects also it ridiculed and vilified the prophets, our Saviour, His disciples, and the Sacred Scriptures.

promulgates the opinions with whose truth he is impressed, for the benefit of others, is, for so doing, amenable as a criminal; but a malicious and mischievous intention is in such case the broad boundary between right and wrong; and that if it can be collected, from the offensive levity with which so serious a subject is treated, or from other circumstances, that the act of the party was malicious, then, since the law has no means of distinguishing between different degrees of evil tendency, if the matter published contain any such tendency, the publisher becomes amenable to justice.'(c)

Where a defendant was charged with publishing a libel upon a religious order, consisting of females, professing the Roman Catholic faith, called the Scorton Nunnery, Alderson, B., observed, a person may, without being liable to prosecution for it, attack Judaism or Mahomedanism, or even any sect of the Christian religion, save the established religion of the country; and the only reason why the latter is in a different situation from the other is, because it is the form established by law, and is therefore a part of the constitution of the country. For the same reason any general attack on Christianity is the subject of a criminal prosecution, because Christianity is the established religion of the country. Any person has a right to entertain his opinions, to express them, to discuss the subject of the Roman Catholic religion, and its institutions; but he has no right in so doing to attack the characters of individuals. (d)

As to the extent of this offence and the nature and certainty of the words, it appears to be immaterial whether the publication is oral or written; though the committing mischievous matter to print or writing, and thereby affording it a wider circulation, would undoubtedly be considered as an aggravation, and affect the measure of punishment. (e)

2. When the Star Chamber had been abolished, it appears that the Court of King's Bench came to be considered as the custos morum, having cognizance of all offences against the public morals; (f) under which head may be comprehended representations whether by writing, picture, sign, or substitute, tending to vitiate and corrupt the minds and morals of the people. (g) Formerly, indeed, it appears to have been holden that publications of this kind were not punishable in the temporal courts: (h) but a different doctrine has since been established. (i) And in late times indictments for obscene writings and prints have frequently been preferred, without any objection having been made to the jurisdiction of the temporal courts.

The principle of the cases upon this subject seems to comprehend oral communications, when made before a large assembly, and when there is a clear tendency to produce immorality, as in the case of the performance of an obscene play. (k)

3. Libels against the constitution, abstracted from all personal allusions, do not appear, either in ancient or modern times, to have been often made the subject of legal inquiry. In general, publications upon the constitution, avoiding all discussions of personal rights and privileges, are speculative in their nature, and not calculated to generate popular heat. But if they should be of a different description, tending to degrade and vilify the constitution, to promote insurrection, and circulate discontent through its members, they would, without doubt, be considered as seditious and criminal. (l)

Thus it appears to have been adjudged, that though no indictment lay for saying that the laws of the realm were not the laws of God, because true it is that they are not the laws of God; yet that it would be otherwise to say that the laws of the realm are contrary to the laws of God. (m) And a defendant was convicted on an information charging him with having published, concerning the government of England and the traitors who adjudged King Charles the First to death, that the government of the kingdom consists of three estates, and that if a rebellion should happen in the kingdom, unless that rebellion was against the three estates, it was no rebellion. (n) In another case a person was convicted for publishing a libel, in which it was suggested that the revolution was an unjust and unconstitutional proceeding, and the limitation established by the Act of Settlement was represented as illegal, and that the revolution and settlement of the crown as by law established had been attended with fatal and pernicious consequences to the subjects of this kingdom. (o)

4. Though a different construction may have prevailed in more arbitrary times, it is now settled that bare words, not relative to any act or design, however wicked, indecent, or reprehensible they may be, are not in themselves overt acts of high treason; but only a misprision, punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment, or other corporal punishment. (p) Though words may expound an overt act, and show with what intent it was done. (q) And, generally speaking, any words, acts, or writing tending to vilify or disgrace the King, or to lessen him in the esteem of his subjects, or any denial of his right to the crown, even in common and unadvised discourse, amount at common law to a misprision punishable by fine and imprisonment. There are also some legislative provisions upon this subject. The nature of the offence of libel against the monarch personally has been ably explained and illustrated, according to the more mild and liberal doctrines of the present time, in a case of recent occurrence.

The defendant was charged with having published a libel to the following effect: 'What a crowd of blessings rush upon one's mind, that might be bestowed upon the country in the event of a total change of system! Of all monarchs, indeed, since the Revolution, the successor of George the Third will have the finest opportunity of becoming nobly popular.' Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in addressing the jury, stated, that the first sentence of this passage would easily admit of an innocent interpretation; that the fair meaning of the expression 'change of system' was a change of political system—not a change in the frame of the established government—but in the measures of policy which had been for some time pursued; and that by total change of system was certainly not meant subversion or demolition, the descent of the crown to the successor of his Majesty being mentioned immediately after. His lordship then proceeded:—'If a person who admits the wisdom and virtues of his Majesty, laments that in the exercise of these he has taken an unfortunate and erroneous view of the interests of his dominions, I am not prepared to say that this tends to degrade his Majesty, or to alienate the affections of his subjects. I am not prepared to say that this is libellous. But it must be with perfect decency and respect, and without any imputation of bad motives. Go one step further, and say or insinuate that his Majesty acts from any partial or corrupt view or with an intention to favour or oppress any individual or class of men, and it would become most libellous.' Upon the second sentence, after stating that it was more equivocal, and telling the jury that they must determine what was the fair import of the words employed, not in the more lenient or severe sense, but in the sense fairly belonging to them, and which they were intended to convey, Lord Ellenborough proceeded: 'Now do these words mean, that his Majesty is actuated by improper motives, or that his successor may render himself nobly popular by taking a more lively interest in the welfare of his subjects? Such sentiments, as it would be most mischievous, so it would be most criminal to propagate. But if the passage only means that his Majesty, during his reign, or any length of time, may have taken an imperfect view of the interests of the country, either respecting our foreign relations, or the system of our internal policy; if it imputes nothing but honest error, without moral blame, I am not prepared to say that it is a libel.' And again, towards the conclusion of his address his lordship said, 'The question of intention is for your consideration. You will not distort the words, but give them their application and meaning as they impress your minds. What appears to me most material is the substantive

Rex v. Lambert. It is not libellous for a writer who allows the sovereign to be solicitous for the welfare of his subjects, and who has no intention of calumniating him, or of bringing his personal government into public odium, to express regret that he has taken an erroneous view of any question of foreign or domestic policy.

paragraph itself; (u) and if you consider it as meant to represent that the reign of his Majesty is the only thing interposed between the subjects of this country and the possession of great blessings which are likely to be enjoyed in the reign of his successor, and thus to render his Majesty's administration of his government odious, it is a calumnious paragraph, and to be dealt with as a libel. If on the contrary you do not see that it means distinctly, according to your reasoning, to impute any purposed maladministration to his Majesty, or those acting under him, but may be fairly construed as an expression of regret, that an erroneous view has been taken of public affairs, I am not prepared to say that it is a libel. There have been errors in the administration of the most enlightened men.' (v)

Falsely publishing that the King is labouring under mental derangement is a libel: it tends to unsettle and agitate the public mind, and to lower the respect due to the King. (w)

Of publications against the two Houses of Parliament.

The two Houses of Parliament are an essential part of the constitution, and entitled to reverence and respect, on account of the important public duties which they have to discharge. But as they have the power of treating libels against them as breaches of their privileges, and vindicating them in the nature of contempts, more cases of such libels are to be met with in their journals than in the proceedings of the courts of law. The common law, however, is fully capable of taking cognizance of any publications reflecting in a libellous manner upon the members or proceedings of the Houses of Parliament; (x) and it seems rather to have been the inclination of Parliament in modern times to direct prosecutions for such offences in the courts of common law, and to waive the exercise of their own extensive privileges. In the case of the King v. Stockdale, (y) the attorney-general in his speech to the jury, after stating the address of the House of Commons to the King, praying that his Majesty would direct the information to be filed, proceeded thus, 'I state it as a measure which they have taken, thinking it in their wisdom, as every one must think it, to be the fittest to bring before a jury of their country an offender against themselves, avoiding thereby, what sometimes indeed is unavoidable, but which they wish to avoid whenever it can be done with propriety, the acting both as judges and accusers, which they must necessarily have done, had they resorted to their own powers, which are great and extensive, for the purpose of vindi-

(u) The libel was published in a newspaper; and it had been allowed to the defendant to have read in evidence an extract from the same paper connected with the subject of the passage charged as libellous, although disjoined from it by extraneous matter, and printed in a different character.

Stockdale, 28 Geo. 3, an information was filed by the attorney-general for a libel upon the House of Commons. A prosecution was also instituted in Rex v. Reeves, 36 Geo. 3, in consequence of a resolution of the House of Commons, declaring a pamphlet, published by the defendant, to be a libel. In the pamphlet, which was called 'Thoughts on the English Government,' there was this passage amongst others which the House deemed libellous—'That the King's government might go on if the Lords and Commons were lopped off.' The jury considered the expressions as merely metaphorical, and acquitted the defendant.

ating themselves against insult and contempt, but which in the present instance they have wisely forborne to exercise, thinking it better to leave the offender to be dealt with by a fair and impartial jury.' (z)

VI. The extent to which the measures of the King, or the proceedings of his government, may be fairly and legally canvassed, has been the subject of much discussion, as it is undoubtedly one of the first importance: but it is not within the scope and design of this Treatise to enter further upon the question, than by stating a few of the established principles and decided cases.

It may be observed, that the liberty of discussion, which in many instances has been admitted on the part of the officers of the crown, would seem to be sufficient to answer all the purposes of the honest patriot;—the man who would condemn only with a view to genuine and constitutional reformation. Upon a late prosecution for a libel the attorney-general, in his opening to the jury, thus expressed himself: 'The right of every man to represent what he may conceive to be an abuse or grievance in the government of the country, if his intention in so doing be honest, and the statement made upon fair and open grounds, can never for a moment be questioned. I shall never think it my duty to prosecute any person for writing, printing, and publishing, fair and candid opinions on the system of the government and constitution of this country, nor for pointing out what he may honestly conceive to be grievances, nor for proposing legal means of redress.' (a) Every man has a right to give every public matter a candid, full, and free discussion; but although the people have a right to discuss any grievances they have to complain of, they must not do it in a way to excite tumult; and if a party publish a paper on any such matter, and it contain no more than a calm and quiet discussion, allowing something for a little feeling in men's minds, that will be no libel; but if the paper go beyond that limit, and be calculated to excite tumult, it is a libel. (b)

In many cases which may occur, the due exercise of this liberty and right of discussion will involve considerations of much difficulty, and require great nicety of discrimination: as it may become necessary to ascertain the particular points at which the bounds of rational discussion have been exceeded. The answer to the following question has, however, been proposed as a test, by which the intrinsic illegality of such publications may be decided: (c) 'Has the communication a plain tendency to produce public mischief by perverting the mind of the subject, and creating a general dissatisfaction towards government?'

However innocent and allowable it may be to canvass political measures within these limits, it is quite clear that their discussion must not be made a cloak for an attack upon private character. Libels on persons employed in a public capacity receive an aggravation as they tend to scandalize the government by reflecting on those who are entrusted with the administration of public affairs; for they not only endanger the public peace, as all other libels do, by stirring up the parties immediately concerned to acts of revenge, but also have a direct tendency to breed in the people a dislike of their governors, and incline them to faction and sedition. (d) If a paper has a direct tendency to cause unlawful meetings and disturbances, and to lead to a violation of the laws, it is a seditious libel. (e)

Cases.

A person delivered a ticket up to the minister after sermon, wherein he desired him to take notice that offences passed now without control from the civil magistrate, and to quicken the civil magistrate to do his duty, &c.; and this was held to be a libel, though no magistrate in particular was mentioned, and though it was not averred that the magistrates suffered those vices knowingly. (f)

Reg. v. Tuchin.

In a case where the defendant was prosecuted upon an information for a libel upon the government, his counsel contended that the publication was innocent, and could not be considered as libellous, because it did not reflect upon particular persons. But Holt, C. J., said, 'They say nothing is a libel but what reflects on some particular person. But this is a very strange doctrine to say that it is not a libel, reflecting on the government, endeavouring to possess the people that the government is maladministered by corrupt persons that are employed in such stations, either in the navy or army. To say that corrupt officers are appointed to administer affairs is certainly a reflection on the government. If men should not be called to account for possessing the people with an ill opinion of the government, no government can subsist; nothing can be worse to any government than to endeavour to procure animosities as to the management of it; this has always been looked upon as a crime, and no government can be safe unless it be punished.' (g)

Rex v. Cobbett.

This doctrine was recognized in a case, where the defendant was charged with publishing a libel upon the administration of the Irish government, and upon the public conduct and character of the Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in his address to the jury, observed, 'It is no new doctrine that if a publication be calculated to alienate the affections of the people, by bringing the government into disesteem, whether the expedient be by ridicule or obloquy, the person so conducting himself is exposed to the inflictions of the law. It is a crime; it has ever been considered as a crime, whether wrapt in one form or another. The case of Reg. v. Tuchin, decided in the time of Lord Chief Justice Holt, has removed all ambiguity from this question; and, although at the period when that case was decided great political contentions existed, the matter was not again brought before the judges of the Court by any application for a new trial.' And afterwards his lordship said, 'It has been observed, that it is the right of the British subject to exhibit the folly or imbecility of the members of the government. But, gentlemen, we must confine ourselves within limits. If in so doing individual feelings are violated, there the line of interdiction begins, and the offence becomes the subject of penal visitation.' (h)

VII. As nothing tends more to the disturbance of the public weal than aspersions upon the administration of justice; contempts against the King's judges, and scandalous reflections upon their proceedings, have always been considered as highly criminal offences; and one of the earliest cases of libel appears to have been an indictment for an offence of this kind (i)

Of publications against magistrates and the administration of justice.

Generally, any contemptuous or contumacious words spoken to the judges of any courts in the execution of their offices are indictable; and when reflecting words are spoken of the judges of the superior courts at Westminster, the speaker is indictable both at common law and under the statutes of scandalum magnatum, whether the words relate to their office or not. (k)

Any publications reflecting upon and calumniating the administration of justice, are, without doubt, of a libellous nature; and where a libel was published in a newspaper, in the form of an advertisement, reflecting on the proceedings of a court of justice, it was characterized as a reproach to the justice of the nation, a thing insufferable, and a contempt of court. (l) So an order made by a corporation and entered in their books stating that A. (against whom a jury had found a verdict with large damages in an action for a malicious prosecution, and which verdict had been confirmed in the Court of Common Pleas,) was actuated by motives of public justice in preferring the indictment, was held to be a libel reflecting on the administration of justice, for which an information should be granted against the members who had made the order. Ashhurst, J., said, that the assertion that A. was actuated by motives of public justice carried with it an imputation on the public justice of the country; for if those were his only motives, then the verdict must be wrong. Buller, J., said, 'Nothing can be of greater importance to the welfare of the public than to put a stop to the animadversions and censures which are so frequently made on courts of justice in this country. They can be of no service, and may be attended with the most mischievous consequences. Cases may happen in which the judge and jury may be mistaken: when they are, the law has afforded a remedy; and the party injured is entitled to pursue every method which the law allows to correct the mistake. But when a person has recourse either by a writing like the present, by publications in print, or by any other means, to calumniate the proceedings of a court of justice, the obvious tendency of it is to weaken the administration of justice, and in consequence to sap the very foundation of the constitution itself.' Rex v. White.

In a late case the same doctrine was acted upon: but it was at the same time clearly admitted that it would be lawful to discuss the merits of the verdict of a jury, or the decisions of a judge, provided it be done with candour and decency. An information was filed against the proprietors and printers of a Sunday newspaper, for a libel upon Le Blanc, J., and a jury, by whom a prisoner had been tried for murder and acquitted; and it was contended on the part of the defendants that they had only made a fair use of their right to canvass the proceedings of a court of justice. Grose, J., said, that 'it certainly was lawful, with decency and candour, to discuss the propriety of the verdict of a jury, or the decisions of a judge; and if the defendants should be thought to have done no more in this instance, they would be entitled to an acquittal: but, on the contrary, they had transgressed the law, and ought to be convicted, if the extracts from the newspaper, set out in the information, contained no reasoning or discussion, but only declamation and invective, and were written not with a view to elucidate the truth, but to injure the characters of individuals, and to bring into hatred and contempt the administration of justice in the country.' (n) spoken of, or to, inferior magistrates.

It seems that no indictment will lie for contemptuous words spoken either of or to inferior magistrates, unless they are at the time in the actual execution of their duty, or at least unless the words affect them directly in their office; though it may be good cause for binding the offender to his good behaviour. (o) This doctrine was recognized in a case, where the defendant was indicted for saying of a justice of the peace for the county of Middlesex, in his absence, that he was a scoundrel and a liar. (p) Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, 'the words not being spoken to the justice, I think they are not indictable. This doctrine is laid down by Lord Holt in a case in Salkeld; (q) and in Rex v. Pocock (r) the Court of King's Bench refused to grant an information for saying of a justice, in his absence, that he was a forsworn rogue. However, I will not direct an acquittal upon this point, as it is upon the record, and may be taken advantage of in arrest of judgment. It will be for the jury now to say whether these words were spoken of the prosecutor as a justice of the peace, and with intent to defame him in that capacity; for if they were not, this indictment is not supported; and it could not by possibility be a misdemeanor to utter them, although the prosecutor's name may be in the commission of the peace for the county of Middlesex.' (s) But it has been holden to be an indictable offence to say of a justice of the peace, when in the execution of his office, 'you are a rogue and a liar.' (t) The Court will not, however, grant an information for calling a magistrate a liar, accusing him of misconduct in having absented himself from an election of clerk to the magistrates, and threatening a repetition of the same language whenever such magistrate came into the town, unless they tend to a breach of the peace. (u)

VIII. As every person desires to appear agreeable in life, and must be highly provoked by such ridiculous representations of him as tend to lessen him in the esteem of the world, and take away his reputation, which to some men is more dear than life itself; it has been held that not only charges of a flagrant nature, and which reflect a moral turpitude on the party, are libellous, but also such as set him in a scurrilous, ignominious, or ludicrous (v) light, whether expressed in printing or writing, or by signs or pictures; for these equally create ill blood, and provoke the parties to acts of revenge and breaches of the peace. (w)

But it should be observed, that there is an important distinction under this head between words spoken only, and words published by writing or printing. Words spoken, however scurrilous, even though spoken personally to an individual, are not the subject of indictment, unless they directly tend to a breach of the peace, as if they convey a challenge to fight. (x) But words, though not scandalous in themselves, if published in writing, and tending in any degree to the discredit of a man, have been held to be libellous. (y)

Upon these principles it has been held to be libellous to write of a man that he had the itch, and stunk of brimstone. (z) And an information was granted against the mayor of a town for sending to a nobleman a license to keep a public house. (a) An information was also granted for a publication reflecting upon a person who had been unsuccessful in a lawsuit; (b) and against the printer of a newspaper for publishing a ludicrous paragraph, giving an account of the marriage of a nobleman with an actress, and of his appearing with her in the boxes with jewels, &c. And in Rex v. Cobbett, Holt on Libel, 114, 115, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, 'No man has a right to render the person or abilities of another ridiculous, not only in publications, but if the peace and welfare of individuals, or of society, be interrupted, or even exposed by types and figures, the act, by the law of England, is a libel.'

Lord Kerry, 4 Taunt. 355 (in the Exchequer Chamber) it was held, that an action may be maintained for words written for which an action could not be maintained if they were merely spoken. Mansfield, C. J., stated the arguments which would have prevailed in his mind to repudiate the distinction between written and spoken scandal, but that the distinction had been established by some of the greatest names known to the law, Lord Hardwicke, Hale, Holt, and others; and that Lord Hardwicke, C. J., had especially laid it down, that an action for a libel may be brought on words written when the words, if spoken, would not sustain it.

A defendant was convicted for publishing a libel in a review, tending to traduce, vilify, and ridicule an officer of high rank in the navy; and to insinuate that he wanted courage and veracity; and to cause it to be believed that he was of a conceited, obstinate, and incendiary disposition. (d) And an information was granted against a printer of a newspaper, for publishing a paragraph containing a libel on the Bishop of Derry, by representing him as a bankrupt. (e) But in an action for publishing a libel by posting it on a paper in the Casino-room at Southwold, containing these words, 'The Rev. John Robinson and Mr. James Robinson, inhabitants of this town, not being persons that the proprietors and annual subscribers think it proper to associate with, are excluded this room;' the Court of Exchequer held, that the publication was not a libel, as it did not affect the moral character of the plaintiffs, nor state that they were not proper persons for general society; that the paper might import no more than that the plaintiff was not a social and agreeable character in the intercourse of common life. (f) But where a count alleged that the defendant published of the Duke of Brunswick the following libel: 'Why should Theophilus be surprised at anything Mrs. W. does? If she chooses to entertain the Duke of Brunswick, she does what very few will do; and she is of course at liberty to follow the bent of her own inclining, by inviting all the expatriated foreigners who crowd our streets to her table, if she thinks fit;' the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the matter stated was libellous, as it might be understood in such a sense as to be injurious to the prosecutor's character. (g)

reflecting upon a man in respect of his trade.

A publication reflecting upon a man in respect of his trade may also be libellous; as where A., a gunsmith, published in an advertisement that he had invented a short kind of gun, that shot as far as others of a longer size, and that he was gunsmith to the Prince of Wales; and B., another gunsmith, counter-advertised, 'That whereas, &c. (reciting the former advertisement), he desired all gentlemen to be cautious, for that the said A. durst not engage with any artist in town, nor ever did make such an experiment, except out of a leather gun, as any gentleman might be satisfied at the Cross Guns in Long Acre, the said B.'s house.' The Court held, that though B., or any other of the trade, might counter-advertise what was published by A., yet it should have been done without any general reflections on him in the way of his business: that the advice to 'all gentlemen to be cautious,' was a reflection upon his honesty; and the allegation that he would not engage with an artist was setting him below the rest of his trade, and calling him a bungler in general terms; and that the expression 'except out of a leather gun' was charging him with a lie, the word gun being vulgarly used for a lie, and gunner for a liar, and that therefore these words were libellous. fession are slanderous, if they impute incapacity, or misconduct, or want of some qualification necessary to carry on the office or profession of such person, but not otherwise. (i)

General imputations upon a body of men are indictable, though no individuals may be pointed out. (k) An information was prayed against the defendant for publishing a paper containing an account of a murder committed upon a Jewish woman and her child, by certain Jews lately arrived from Portugal, and living near Broad Street, because the child was begotten by a Christian. (l) It was objected that no information should be granted in this case, because it did not appear who in particular the persons reflected on were. (m) But the Court said, that admitting that an information for a libel might be improper, yet the publication of this paper was deservedly punishable in an information for a misdemeanor, and that of the highest kind; such sort of advertisements necessarily tending to raise tumults and disorders amongst the people, and inflame them with an universal spirit of barbarity against a whole body of men, as if guilty of crimes scarcely practicable, and wholly incredible. (n) And if some of the individuals affected by the libel are specified, it will be sufficient; as where it was objected that the names of certain trustees, who were part of the body prosecuting, were not mentioned, Lord Hardwicke observed, that though there were authorities where, in cases of libel upon persons in their private capacities, it had been holden necessary that some particular person should be named, this was never carried so far as to make it necessary that every person injured by such libel should be specified. (o)

General imputations upon a body of men are indictable.

Where a publication stated that, upon the death of her late Majesty, none of the bells of the several churches at Durham were tolled; and ascribed this omission to the clergy, and then proceeded to make some very severe observations on that body, a criminal information was granted. (p)

A malicious defamation of one who is dead, if published with a malevolent purpose, to vilify the memory of the deceased, and with a view to injure his posterity, will be libellous; but it has been holden that an indictment for a libel, reflecting on the memory of a deceased person, cannot be supported, unless it state that it was done with a design to bring contempt on his family, or to stir up the hatred of the King's subjects against his relations, and to induce them to break the peace in vindicating the honour of the family. and also in the case of communications considered as confidential, or made bonâ fide with a view of investigating a fact, or in the regular and proper course of a proceeding.

Comments upon literary productions.

A publication commenting upon a literary work, exposing its follies and errors, and holding up the author to ridicule, will not be deemed a libel, provided such comment does not exceed the limits of fair and candid criticism, by attacking the character of the writer, unconnected with his publication; and every one has a right to publish a comment of this description. (r) But if a person, under the pretence of criticising a literary work, defames the private character of the author, and, instead of writing in the spirit and for the purpose of fair and candid discussion, travels into collateral matter, and introduces facts not stated in the work, accompanied with injurious comments upon them, such person is a libeller. (s) So if a reviewer imputes base, sordid, dishonest, and wicked motives, it is no answer that the reviewer published only what he believed was correct and true. (t) A fair and candid comment on a place of public entertainment, in a newspaper, is not a libel. (u) And there is no distinction between a handbill, circular, or advertisement of a tradesman and a book; both are literary productions, and are addressed to the public, and both are subject to such comments as do not exceed the bounds of fair and reasonable criticism. (v)

Handbills.

Sermons.

It has been doubted whether the preaching a sermon in the ordinary mode of a clergyman's duty, makes it public property, so as to allow observations upon it in the same way that a publication of a literary work does. (w) And if a clergyman chooses to institute or to recommend a subscription among his parishioners for a charity of any kind, and makes regulations for that purpose, by so doing he does not put these regulations in the same position as a literary work, and make them public property, and so give occasion to any person to make criticisms on his conduct in that respect. (x)

Confidential
tions.

Confidential communications are in some cases privileged: as where it was holden that a letter written confidentially to persons who employed A. as their solicitor, conveying charges injurious to his professional character in the management of certain concerns which they had entrusted to him, and in which B., the writer of the letter, was likewise interested, was not a libel. (y) And if a person, in a private letter to the party, should expostulate with him about some vices, of which he apprehends him to be guilty, and desire him to refrain from them; or if a person should send such a letter to a father, in relation to some faults of his children; these, it seems, would not be considered as libellous, but as acts of friendship, not designed for defamation but reformation. (z) But this doctrine must be applied with some caution; since the sending an abusive letter filled with provoking language to another, is an offence of a public nature, and punishable as such, inasmuch as it tends to create ill blood, and cause a disturbance of the public peace; (a) and the reason assigned by Lord Bacon, why such private letter should be punishable, seems to be a very sufficient one, namely, that it enforces the party to whom the letter is directed to publish it to his friends, and thus induces a compulsory publication. (b) And though a letter written by a master, in giving a character of a servant, will not be libellous, unless its contents be not only false but malicious; (c) yet in such a case malice may be inferred from the circumstances. (d)

Where a writer is acting on any duty, legal or moral, towards the person to whom he writes, or where he has by his situation to protect the interests of another, that which he writes under such circumstances is a privileged communication, if he write it bonâ fide. If, therefore, a tenant be desired by his landlord to make communications to him in respect of any neglect of duty in his gamekeepers, any communication made by him in respect of any such neglect of duty is privileged, if written bonâ fide, and on the supposition that he was doing his duty to his landlord. (e)

If a man bonâ fide writes a letter in his own defence, and for the defence of his rights and interests, and is not actuated by any malice, that letter is privileged, although it may impute dishonesty to another. (f)

Any one in the transaction of business with another has a right to use language bonâ fide, which is relevant to that business, and which a due regard to his own interest makes necessary, even if it should directly or by its consequences be injurious or painful to another; and this is the principle upon which privileged communication rests; but defamatory comments on the motives or conduct of the party with whom he is dealing do not fall within that rule. (g) But the privilege, which protects a communication, must result from a right to discuss the particular matter in respect of which the alleged libel is published; nothing else can be privileged. Where, therefore, remarks were made reflecting on a matter in respect of which the libel is published.

Communications made bonâ fide, or with a view of investigating a fact.

Or made in the proper course of a proceeding.

Roman Catholic priest at a public meeting called for the purpose of petitioning Parliament against the grant to the Roman Catholic College at Maynooth, it was held that the speaker was not justified by the circumstance that the libel was published in the course of a bonâ fide discussion respecting the propriety of supporting that college. (h)

Although that which is written may be injurious to the character of another, yet if done bonâ fide, or with a view of investigating a fact, in which the party making it is interested, it is not libellous. Thus where an advertisement was published by the defendant at the instigation of A., the plaintiff's wife, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the plaintiff had another wife living when he married A., it was holden that although the advertisement might impute bigamy to the plaintiff, yet having been published under such authority, and with such a view, it was not libellous. (i)

A communication fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest is concerned, is a privileged communication. (k) And if the communication be made in the regular and proper course of a proceeding, it will not be libellous. As where a writing, containing the defendant's case, and stating that some money, due to him from the government for furnishing the guard at Whitehall with fire and candle, had been improperly obtained by a Captain C., was directed to a general officer, and the four principal officers of the guards, to be presented to his Majesty for redress, an information was refused, on the ground that the writing was no libel, but a representation of an injury drawn up in a proper way for redress, without any intention to asperse the prosecutor; and that though there was a suggestion of fraud, yet that is no more than is contained in every bill in Chancery, which is never held libellous if relative to the subject matter. (l) So a petition addressed by a creditor of an officer in the army to the Secretary-at-War, bonâ fide, and with the view of obtaining, through his interference, the payment of a debt due, and containing a statement of facts which, though derogatory to the officer's character, the creditor believed to be true, is not a malicious libel for which an action is maintainable. (m) A letter written to the Postmaster-General, or to the Secretary to the General Post-Office, complaining of misconduct in a postmaster, or guard of a mail, is not a libel, if it was written as a bonâ fide complaint to obtain redress for a grievance that the party really believed he had suffered. (n) And where the defendant, being deputy-governor of Greenwich Hospital, wrote a large volume, containing an account of the abuses of the hospital, and treating the characters of many of the officers of the hospital (who were public officers), and Lord Sandwich in particular, who was First Lord of the Admiralty, with much asperity, and printed several copies of it, which he distributed to the governors of the hospital only, and not to any other person; the rule for an information was discharged. Lord Mansfield said, that this distribution of the copies to the persons only who were from their situations called on to redress these grievances, and had, from their situations, competent power to do it, was not a publication sufficient to make the writing a libel. (o) Where, however, the defendant wrote a letter to the Secretary of State, imputing to the town clerk and clerk to the justices of a borough corruption in the latter office, it was held that this was not privileged, because the Secretary of State had no direct authority in respect of the matter complained of, and was not a competent tribunal to receive the application. (p) But a memorial presented to the Secretary of State for the Home Department by the elector of a borough complaining of the conduct of a justice of the peace during a recent election of a Member of Parliament for the borough, and imputing that he had made speeches inciting to a breach of the peace, and praying that the secretary would cause an inquiry to be made into the conduct of the plaintiff, and that, on the allegations being substantiated, the secretary would recommend to the Queen that the justice should be removed from the commission of the peace, is a privileged communication; for though the Lord Chancellor generally is consulted as to the removal of justices of the peace, the memorial might be considered as addressed to the Queen, through the secretary, who might have caused the inquiry to be made, have communicated with the Lord Chancellor, and have, in effect, recommended the removal of the justice. (q) And where the publication is an admonition, or in the course of the discipline of a religious sect, as the sentence of expulsion from a society of Quakers, it is not libellous. (r) So a letter written by a son-in-law to his mother-in-law, containing imputations on the character of a person whom she was about to marry, and desiring a diligent and attentive inquiry into his character, if written bonâ fide, is a privileged communication. (s) And it has been decided, that an action will not lie for words innocently read as a story out of a book, however false and defamatory they may be. Thus where a clergyman in a sermon recited a story out of Fox's Martyrology, that one G., being a perjured person, and a great persecutor, had great plagues inflicted upon him, and was killed by the hand of God; whereas in truth he never was so plagued, and was himself actually present at the Proper meaning of a privileged communication.

The proper meaning of a privileged communication is this: that the occasion on which the communication was made, rebuts the inference, primâ facie, arising from a statement prejudicial to the character of the plaintiff, and puts it upon him to prove that there was malice in fact; that the defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill will, independent of the occasion on which the communication was made. This may be made out either from the language of the letter itself, or by extrinsic evidence, or by proof of the conduct or expressions of the defendant, showing that he was actuated by a motive of personal ill will. (u) But where the publication is primâ facie privileged, juries ought not to look too strictly at the particular expressions used, but ought clearly to see that the letter was written with a malicious intent before they find it to be a libel. (v)

Continuance of a confidential relation.

When once a confidential relation is established between two persons, with regard to an enquiry of a private nature, whatever takes place between them relative to the same subject, though at a different time and place, may be entitled to the same privilege as what took place at the original interview; and it is for the jury to decide whether any further conversation on the same subject, though apparently casual and voluntary, did not take place under the influence of the confidential relation already established, and therefore is privileged. (w)

It is for the judge to say whether the privilege exists, and for the jury whether there is actual malice.

It is matter of law for the judge to determine whether the occasion of writing or speaking criminary language repels the inference of malice, constituting what is called a privileged communication; and if at the close of the case for the prosecution there is no intrinsic or extrinsic evidence of malice, it is the duty of the judge to direct a verdict for the defendant; but wherever there is evidence of malice, either intrinsic or extrinsic, it is the duty of the judge to leave the question of express malice to the jury. (x) But where a communication is primâ facie privileged, in order to leave the question of malice to the jury, it is not enough that the facts proved are consistent with the presence of malice as well as with its absence; for actual malice must be proved, and therefore its absence must be presumed until such proof is given. (y)

When express malice is to be proved.

IX. Upon the ground that malicious and scurrilous reflections upon those who are possessed of rank and influence in foreign states may tend to involve this country in disputes and warfare, it has been held that publications tending to degrade and defame persons in considerable situations of power and dignity in foreign countries may be treated as libels. Thus an information was filed, by the command of the crown, for a libel on a French ambassador, then residing at the British court, consisting principally of some angry reflections on his public conduct, and charging him with ignorance in his official capacity, and with having used stratagem to supplant and depreciate the defendant at the court of Versailles. (z) And Lord George Gordon was found guilty upon an information for having published some severe reflections upon the Queen of France, in which she was represented as the leader of a faction: upon which occasion Ashhurst, J., observed, in passing sentence, that the object of the publication being to rekindle animosities between England and France by the personal abuse of the sovereign of one of them, it was highly necessary to repress an offence of so dangerous a nature: and that such libels might be supposed to have been made with the connivance of the state where they were published, unless the authors were subjected to punishment. (a) So a defendant was found guilty upon an information charging him with having published the following libel: 'The Emperor of Russia is rendering himself obnoxious to his subjects by various acts of tyranny, and ridiculous in the eyes of Europe by this inconsistency. He has lately passed an edict to prohibit the exportation of deals and other naval stores. In consequence of this ill-judged law, a hundred sail of vessels are likely to return to this country without freight.' (b)

And in a case where the defendant was charged by an information with a libel upon Napoleon Buonaparte, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in his address to the jury, said, 'I lay it down as law, that any publication which tends to degrade, revile, and defame persons in considerable situations of power and dignity in foreign countries, may be taken to be and treated as a libel; and particularly when it has a tendency to interrupt the pacific relations between the two countries.' (c)

Having stated the different sorts of publications for which a party may be found guilty of libel, we may mention some of the points relating to the indictment and evidence on a prosecution for this offence.

An indictment for a libel must import to whom the libellous matter referred: and stating that the libel was published to defame and vilify J. S., and to bring him into disgrace, and concluding that it was to the great scandal and disgrace of J. S., is not sufficient to show that the libellous matter referred to J. S. An indictment stated that the defendant intended to vilify W. S., Mayor of Colchester, and a justice; and in order to cause it to be believed that W. S., as such mayor, had been guilty of great abuse in granting an ale-license to J. L., and in order to bring him into great disgrace, published a certain scandalous libel, in which said libel was contained, &c., and the libel stated a speech supposed to have been made before the borough magistrates by a fictitious character, called Excise, who was supposed to lay before them a case of gross corruption, sanctioned by the mayor (innuendo the said W. S.) to the great scandal, injury, and disgrace of the said W. S. The usual allegation, that the libellous matter was of and concerning W. S. was omitted; and, on account of this omission, the judgment was arrested. (d) Where a count alleged that the defendant published of and concerning the Duke of Brunswick the following libel: ‘the evidence to facts in relation to the particular subject alluded to is procuring; and we have no doubt sufficient information will be obtained for a strong case to lay before the Home Secretary, to enable that functionary to cause it to be intimated to the suspected party (meaning the said duke) that his presence here can be dispensed with, as it may be attended with danger to himself,’ thereby meaning and intending to have it believed that the said duke was suspected of having committed and had committed some crime which would bring his life into danger from the laws of England; the count was held bad on error, because it did not show in what manner the life of the duke would be endangered. (e) But where a count alleged that the defendant, intending to defame the Duke of Brunswick, published a libel containing divers false and malicious matters and things of and concerning the said duke, that is to say: We should think that no lady would admit to her society such a crack-brained scamp as the Duke of Brunswick (meaning the said duke), the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that these averments showed sufficiently, without more formal introduction, that the libel was of and concerning the duke. (f)

Innuendo.

Where a libel is charged to be of and concerning the government of the kingdom, though it do not in express terms impute to the government any of the facts which it mentions, the Court is to judge from its whole tenor and import (understanding it as other men would understand it (whether it does not mean to cast that imputation. And as an imputation upon some part of a body of men may be a libel, though it does not define what part it means, an allegation that the defendant published of and concerning the said persons, and an innuendo that he meant the said persons, will be understood to apply to that undefined part. An information stated, that the defendant, intending to excite hatred against the government of the realm, and to cause it to be believed that divers subjects had been inhumanly killed by certain troops of the King, published a libel of and concerning the government of this realm, and of and concerning the said troops, which libel stated, that the defendant saw with abhorrence, in the newspapers, the accounts of a transaction at Manchester, and alleged, that unarmed and unresisting men had been inhumanly cut down by the dragoons (meaning the said troops), and then commented strongly upon this being the use of a standing army, and called upon the people to demand justice, &c.; but it did not, in terms, say, that the dragoons acted under the authority or orders of the government. After conviction, a motion was made in arrest of judgment, on the ground that it did not sufficiently appear that the libel was written of and con-

(d) Rex v. Marsden, 4 M. & S. 164. Lord Ellenborough said, that if by inevitable construction no other person could have been intended but W. S., he should have been inclined to support the indictment; but that did not appear. Clement cerning the government, nor of or concerning what troops it was written: but the Court held, that it was obvious, from its whole tenor and import, that it meant to cast imputations upon the government; that it was a libel to impute crime to any of the King's troops, though it did not define what troops in particular were referred to; and that the innuendo of 'the said troops' meant the undefined part of those troops. (g) It is the duty of a judge to say whether a publication is capable of the meaning ascribed to it by an innuendo; but when the judge is satisfied of that, it must be left to the jury to say whether the publication has the meaning so ascribed to it. (h)

Where written or printed matter in itself imports a libel on a person, no statement of extrinsic circumstances, by way of inducement, is necessary. It is no objection, therefore, in arrest of judgment that words are not explained by an innuendo where they are commonly enough understood in a libellous sense to warrant a jury in so applying them; (i) and if, in such a case, there be innuendos improperly enlarging the sense, they may be rejected as surplusage after verdict; (k) for on motion in arrest of judgment, or on error, an innuendo, which is not warranted by the words themselves, or properly connected with them by prefatory matter, may be rejected. (l) Thus, where on error in the House of Lords the judges were asked, 'If a declaration in an action of libel contains an innuendo, which extends the meaning of the words in the libel, can the innuendo be rejected as surplusage, without prejudice to the question whether the matter complained of gives a cause of action?' The judges answered that it might be rejected as repugnant and void. But the case would be different if the words were capable of two senses, and the innuendo ascribed one meaning to them, and was good on the face of it. And the House of Lords held accordingly. (m) If there be contained in the alleged libel matter which is capable of receiving the interpretation put upon it by an innuendo, there is no fault in the count for not having explanatory averments to fix and point the libel. But generally if the words written or spoken cannot apply to the individual, no previous averments or subsequent innuendos can help to give the words an application which they have not. 'Suppose the words to be, "a murder was committed in A.'s house last night," no introduction can warrant the innuendo "meaning that B. committed the said murder," nor would it be helped by the finding of the jury for the plaintiff. For the Court must see that the words do not and cannot mean it, and would arrest the judgment accordingly.' (n) But if ^{*}an innuendo ascribes to certain words a particular meaning, which cannot be supported in evidence, the innuendo, if well pleaded in form, cannot be repudiated on the trial, so as to let in proof that the words have another meaning. (o) If words be laid to be uttered with intent to convey a particular meaning to persons present, it must be proved that the party uttering them had that meaning, and that they were so understood by the hearers; (p) and the whole of an innuendo must be proved, unless it is bad on the face of it. (q)

tion of a libel.

If one man repeats a libel, another writes it, and a third approves what is written, they will all be makers of the libel; and it may be laid down generally that all who are concerned in composing, writing, and publishing a libel, are guilty of the misdemeanor, unless the part they had in the transaction was a lawful or an innocent act; (r) and ignorance has been held not to excuse. Thus upon an information against the defendant, for printing and publishing a libel, the evidence was, that he acted as servant to the printer, and clapped down the press; and few or no circumstances were offered of his knowing the import of the paper, or being conscious that he was doing anything illegal; and Raymond, C. J., held that this made the defendant guilty, and so the jury found him. (s) But there must be a publication; and the mere writing or composing a defamatory paper by anyone, which is confined to his closet, and neither circulated nor read to others, will not render him responsible; nor will he be held to have published the paper, if he deliver it, by mistake, out of his study. (t) But this position admits of great doubt, and two very great judges seem to have been of opinion, that one who composes or writes a libel with intent to defame another, is guilty of a misdemeanor, although the libel be not published. (u) A count charging a defendant with having an obscene libel in his possession, with intent to publish it, seems to be bad. (v) And it will not be a publication of a libel if a party takes a copy of it, provided he never publishes it; (w) but a person who appears once to have

(u) Lord Tenterden, C. J., and Holroyd, J., in Rex v. Burdett, 4 B. & A. 95. Lord Tenterden said, 'The composition of a treasonable paper intended for publication, has, on more than one occasion, been held an overt act of high treason, although the actual publication had been intercepted or prevented, and I have heard nothing on the present occasion to convince my mind that one who composes or writes a libel with intent to defame, may not, under any circumstances, be punished if the libel be not published.' Holroyd J., said, 'Where a misdemeanor has been committed by writing and publishing a libel, the writing of such a libel so published is in my opinion criminal, and liable to be punished by the law of England as a misdemeanor, as well as the publishing of it.' And again, 'The composing and writing, with intent and for the purpose above stated, of a libel proved to have been published by the defendant, is in my opinion of itself a misdemeanor, in whatever county the publishing of it took place. Upon the principle that an act done, and a criminal intention joined to that act are sufficient to constitute a crime (ante p. 85), it should seem that writing a libel with intent to defame is a crime. C. S. G.

(v) Rex v. Rosenstein, 2 C. & F. 414. Park, J. J. A. This count seems clearly bad, on the ground that no act was charged; it is precisely similar to Rex v. Stewart, ante, p. 85. C. S. G.

written a libel, which is afterwards published, will be considered as the maker of it, unless he rebut the presumption of law by showing another to be the author, or prove the act to be innocent in himself. (x) For by Holt, C. J., if a libel appears under a man's handwriting, and no other author is known, he is taken in the mainour, (y) and it turns the proof upon him; and if he cannot produce the composer, it is hard to find that he is not the very man. (z) Where the manuscript of a libel was in the handwriting of the defendant, and a printer had printed five hundred copies from it, three hundred of which had been posted about Birmingham, but there was no evidence to connect the defendant with the printing or the posting, except the handwriting, it was held, that there was evidence to go to the jury that it was published by the defendant. (a) So the sale of an obscene print to a person in a private room, he having requested that such print should be shown to him, his object being to prosecute the seller, is a sufficient publication. (b) Where, in an action for libel contained in a pamphlet, a witness proved that the defendant gave her a pamphlet, and that she read parts of it, and that she had lent it to several persons, and it was returned to her, but she could not swear the copy produced was the same pamphlet the defendant gave her, but it was an exact copy, if it was not the same, and she believed it to be the same, it was held that this was sufficient evidence to be left to the jury. (c)

The reading of a libel in the presence of another, without previous knowledge of its being a libel, or the laughing at a libel read by another, or the saying that such a libel is made by J. S., whether spoken with or without malice, does not amount to a publication. And it has also been held, that he who repeats part of a libel in merriment, without any malice or purpose of defamation, is not punishable: though this has been doubted. (d) But it seems to have been agreed that if he who hath either read a libel himself, or has heard it read by another, do afterwards maliciously read or repeat any part of it in the presence of others, or lend or show it to another, he is guilty of an unlawful publication of it. (e) In an action for a libel contained in a caricature print, where the witness stated, that having heard that the defendant had a copy of this print, he went to his house and

(x) Bac. Abr. tit. Libel (B.) 1. Lamb's case, 9 Co. 59. The writing a libel may be an innocent act in the clerk who draws the indictment, or in the student who takes notes of it. But in a late case (Maloney v. Bartley, 3 Campb. 210) Wood, B., held, on the trial of an action for a libel, in the shape of an extra-judicial affidavit sworn before a magistrate, that a person who acted as the magistrate's clerk was not bound to answer whether by the defendant's orders he wrote the affidavit, and delivered it to the magistrate, as he might thereby criminate himself.

(y) A man was taken with the mainour, mainouvre, when he was taken with the thing stolen in his possession, or, as it was termed in the ancient indictments, captus cum manu opere, and when so taken he might be brought into Court, arraigned, requested liberty to see it, and that the defendant thereupon produced it, and pointed out the figure of the plaintiff and the other persons it ridiculed, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., ruled, that this was not sufficient evidence of publication to support the action. (f)

Proof that the libel was contained in a letter directed to the party, and delivered into the party's hands, is sufficient proof of a publication upon an indictment or information. (g) Addressing a letter to a wife, containing matter reflecting on her husband, is a sufficient publication to support an action. (h) And delivering a libel sealed, in order that it may be opened and published by a third person in a distant county, is a publication. (i) The production of a letter containing a libel with the seal broken, and the postmark on it, is prima facie evidence of publication. (k)

Acknowledgment of the defendant.

In an information for a libel against the doctrine of the Trinity, the witness for the Crown, who produced the libel, swore that it was shown to the defendant, who owned himself the author of that book, errors of the press and some small variations excepted. The counsel for the defendant objected that this evidence would not entitle the attorney-general to read the book, because the confession was not absolute, and therefore amounted to a denial that he was the author of that identical book. But Pratt, C. J., allowed it to be read, saying he would put it upon the defendant to show that there were material variances. (l)

Procuring another to publish is a publication.

It seems to be agreed, that not only he who publishes a libel himself, but also he who procures another to do it, is guilty of the publication; and it is held not to be material whether he who disperses a libel knew anything of the contents or effects of it or not, for that nothing would be more easy than to publish the most virulent papers with the greatest security, if the concealing the purport of them from an illiterate publisher would make him safe in dispersing them. (m) Where a reporter to a newspaper proved that he had given a written statement to the editor of the paper, the contents of which had been communicated to him by the defendant for the purpose of such publication, and that the newspaper then produced was exactly the same, with the exception of some slight alterations, not affecting the sense; it was held, that what the reporter published, in consequence of what passed with the defendant, might be considered as published by the defendant;

A further publication is necessary to support an action. Thus it has been held that where the action was brought for a libel contained in a letter transmitted by the defendant to the plaintiff, by means of a third person, it is a question for the jury whether there has been any publication except to the plaintiff himself, and that if there has not, the defendant is entitled to their verdict. Clutterbuck v. Chaffers, 1 Stark. R. 471. But in an action for a libel contained in a letter written by the defendant to the plaintiff, it was held that proof that the defendant knew that the letters sent to the plaintiff were usually opened by his clerk, was evidence to go to the jury of the defendant's intention that the letter should be read by a third person. *Delacroix v. but that the newspaper could not be read without producing the written account delivered by the reporter to the editor. (n)

The defendant was indicted for causing to be published in a newspaper a libel which told a story of the prosecutor, and added comments on the story, giving it a ludicrous character. The editor of the newspaper stated that the defendant had expressed a wish to him that he would 'show up' the prosecutor, and had told him the story. The witness communicated it to a reporter for the paper, and the libel was substantially what was so communicated. Before the publication the defendant remarked to the witness that the article had not yet appeared. After it had appeared, the defendant told the witness that he had seen it, and that he liked it very much. The witness had heard the story before the defendant told it him. The Court of Queen's Bench held, that on this evidence the jury might find that the defendant authorized the publication of this particular libel, notwithstanding the comments added, as there was both a general authority to publish, and an approval of the particular publication. (o)

Upon this foundation it was for a long time held, that the buying of a book or paper containing libellous matter, in a bookseller's shop, was sufficient evidence to charge the master with the publication, although it did not appear that he knew of any such book being there, or what the contents thereof were, and though he was not upon the premises, and had been kept away for a long time by illness; and it would not be presumed that it was bought and sold there by a stranger; but the master must, if he suggested anything of this kind in his excuse, prove it. (p) So the proprietor of a newspaper was answerable criminally as well as civilly for the acts of his servants in the publication of a libel, although it could be shown that such publication was without the privity of the proprietor; (q) for a person who derives profit from, and who furnishes means for, carrying on the concern, and entrusts the conduct of the publication to one whom he selects, and in whom he confides, may be said to cause to be published what actually appears, and ought to be answerable, although it cannot be shown that he was individually concerned in the particular publication; (r)

'I have no doubt that a man who employs another generally to write a libel must take his chance of what appears, though something may be added which he did not state.'

'Though printing papers and pamphlets is a trade by which persons get their livelihood, yet they must take care to use it with prudence and caution; for if they print anything that is libellous, it is no excuse to say that the printer had no knowledge of the contents, and was entirely ignorant of its being libellous.'

(q) Rex v. Walter, 3 Esp. N. P. C. 21. And in Rex v. Dod, 2 Sess. Cas. 33, pl. 38, Lord Raymond, C. J., said it had been ruled that where a master lived out of town, and his trade was carried on by his servant, the master would be chargeable if his servant should publish a libel in his absence. In 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73, s. 10 (7th edit.), is the following marginal note:—'But if a printer is confined in a prison to which his servants have no access, and they publish a libel without his privity, the publication of it shall not be imputed to him. and these are acts done in the course of the trade or business carried on by the master. But there were cases in which the presumption arising from the proprietorship of a paper might be rebutted. (s) In an action for a libel, where it appeared upon the evidence that the defendant, a tradesman, was accustomed to employ his daughter to write his bills and letters; that a customer, to whom a bill written by the daughter had been sent by the daughter, sent it back on the ground of the charge being too high, and that the bill was afterwards returned to the customer inclosed in a letter also written by the defendant's daughter, and being a libel upon the plaintiff who had inspected and reduced the bill for the customer; it was holden that this was not sufficient evidence to go to a jury, either of command, authority, adoption, or recognition by the defendant. (t) But now, on the trial of an indictment or information, the defendant may prove that the publication was without his authority, consent, or knowledge. (u)

(v) By sec. 4, and schedule A, the word newspaper includes any paper containing public news, intelligence, or occurrences printed in any part of the United Kingdom to be dispersed and made public :

Also any paper printed in any part of the United Kingdom, weekly or oftener, or at intervals not exceeding twenty-six days, containing only or principally advertisements :

And also any paper containing any public news, intelligence, or occurrences, or any remarks or observations thereon, printed in any part of the United Kingdom for sale, and published periodically or in parts or numbers, at intervals not exceeding twenty-six days between the publication of any two such papers, parts, or numbers, where any of the said papers, parts, or numbers respectively shall not exceed two sheets of the dimensions hereinafter specified (exclusive of any cover or blank leaf, or any other leaf upon which any advertisement or other notice shall be printed), or shall be published for sale for a less sum than sixpence, exclusive of the duty by this Act imposed thereon : provided always that no quantity of paper less than a quantity equal to twenty-one inches in length and seventeen inches in breadth, in whatever way or form the same may be made or may be divided into leaves, or in whatever way the same may be printed, shall, with reference to any such paper, part, or number as aforesaid, be deemed or taken to be a sheet of paper :

And provided also, that any of the several papers hereinbefore described shall be liable to the duties by this Act imposed thereon, in whatever way or form the same may be printed or folded, or divided into leaves or stitched, and whether the same shall be folded, divided, or stitched, or not.

Exemptions.

Any paper called 'Police Gazette, or Hue and Cry,' published in Great Britain, by authority of the Secretary of State, or in Ireland, by the authority of the Lord Lieutenant.

Daily accounts or bills of goods imported and exported, or warrants or certificates for the delivery of goods, and the weekly bills of mortality, and also papers containing any lists of prices current, or of the state of the markets, or any account of the arrival, sailing, or other circumstances relating to merchant ships or vessels, or any other matter wholly of a commercial nature; provided such bills, lists, or accounts do not contain any other matter than what hath been usually comprised therein.

Sec. 8. 'All such declarations as aforesaid shall be filed and kept in such manner as the commissioners of stamps and taxes shall direct for the safe custody thereof; and copies thereof, certified to be true copies as by this Act is directed, shall respectively be admitted in all proceedings, civil and criminal, and upon every occasion whatsoever, touching any newspaper mentioned in any such declaration, or touching any publication, matter, or thing contained in any such newspaper, as conclusive evidence of the truth of all such matters set forth in such declaration as are hereby required to be therein set forth, and of their continuance respectively in the same condition down to the time in question, against every person who shall have signed such declaration, unless it shall be proved that previous to such time such person became lunatic, or that previous to the publication in question on such trial such person did duly sign and make a declaration that such person had ceased to be a printer, publisher, or proprietor of such newspaper, and did duly deliver the same to the said commissioners or to such officer as aforesaid, or unless it shall be proved that previous to such occasion as aforesaid a new declaration of the same or a similar nature respectively, or such as may be required by law, was duly signed and made and delivered as aforesaid respecting the same newspaper, in which the person sought to be affected on such trial did not join; and the said commissioners, or the proper authorized officer by whom any such declaration shall be kept according to the directions of this Act, shall, upon application in writing made to them or him respectively by any person requiring a copy certified according to this Act of any such declaration as aforesaid, in order that the same may be produced in any civil or criminal proceeding, deliver such certified copy or cause the same to be delivered to the person applying for the same upon payment of the sum of one shilling, and no more; and in all proceedings and upon all occasions whatsoever a copy of any such declaration certified to be a true copy under the hand of one of the said commissioners or of any officer in whose possession the same shall be, upon proof made that such certificate hath been signed with the handwriting of a person described in or by such certificate as such commissioner or officer, and whom it shall not be necessary to prove to be a commissioner or officer, shall be received in evidence against any and every person named in such declaration as a person making or signing the same as sufficient proof of such declaration, and that the same was duly signed and made according to this Act, and of the contents thereof; and every such copy so produced and certified shall

Sec. 9, in all proceedings, civil or criminal, service of process at the place of printing or publishing mentioned in the declaration is sufficient.

Sec. 10, the titles of newspapers, and the names of the printers and publishers are to be entered in a book at the stamp office, and all persons are to have liberty to inspect it.

Sec. 13. 'The printer or publisher of every newspaper printed or published in the city of London, Edinburgh, or Dublin, or within twenty miles of any of the said cities respectively, shall, upon every day on which such newspaper shall be published or on the day next following which shall not be a holiday, between the hours of ten and three on each day, deliver or cause to be delivered to the commissioners of stamps and taxes, or to the proper authorized officer, at the head office for stamps in one of the said cities

After production of the declaration, and a newspaper intitled as therein mentioned, it shall not be necessary to prove the purchase of the paper.

Penalty on unauthorized persons giving certificates, and on commissioners or officers giving false certificates, £100.

Copies of newspapers shall be delivered to the commissioners of stamps and taxes on penalty of £20, and may be produced in evidence.

touching any other newspaper and any matter or thing therein contained which shall be of the same title, purport, or effect with such copy so delivered as aforesaid, although such copy may vary in some instances or particulars either as to title, purport, or effect; and every printer, publisher, and proprietor of any copy so delivered as aforesaid shall to all intents and purposes be deemed to be the printer, publisher, and proprietor respectively of all newspapers which shall be of the same title, purport, or effect with such copies or impressions so delivered as aforesaid, notwithstanding such variance as aforesaid, unless such printer, publisher, or proprietor respectively shall prove that such newspapers were not printed or published by him, nor by nor with his knowledge or privity: provided always, that if any printer or publisher of any newspaper which shall not be printed and published in the cities of London, Edinburgh, or Dublin, or within twenty miles of the said cities respectively, shall find it more convenient to cause such copies of such newspaper to be delivered to any other distributor of stamps than the distributor in whose district such newspaper shall be published, and such printer or publisher shall state such matter by petition to the commissioners of stamps and taxes, and pray that he may have liberty to cause such copies to be delivered to such other distributor as he shall so name at the office of such distributor, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners to order the same accordingly, and from and after the date of such order the place of publication of such newspaper shall for that purpose only be deemed and taken to be within the district of such other distributor until the same shall be otherwise ordered by the said commissioners.' (y)

Commissioners may allow the printer to lodge his paper with any distributor.

Before the 38 Geo. 3, c. 78, it was holden, upon an indictment for a libel in a newspaper, that evidence that the paper had been sold at the office of the defendant, that the defendant, as proprietor of the paper, had given a bond to the stamp office pursuant to the 29 Geo. 3, c. 50, s. 10, for securing the duties on the advertisements, and that he had from time to time applied to the stamp office respecting the duties on the paper, was evidence to be left to the jury, to show that the defendant was the publisher. (z) And since the statute it has been held to be sufficient evidence of a publication at common law to put in the original affidavit of the proprietor stating where the paper was to be published, and to prove that a paper with a corresponding title, containing the libel, was purchased there. (a) This was held in a case where it

(y) By sec. 14, at the end of every newspaper, and of any and every supplement sheet or piece of paper, shall be printed the Christian name and surname, addition, and place of abode of the printer and publisher of the same, and also a true description of the house or building wherein the same is actually printed and published respectively, and the day of the week, month, and year on which the same is published; and if any person shall knowingly and wilfully print or publish, or cause to be printed or published, any newspaper or supplement thereto whereon the several particulars aforesaid shall not be printed, or whereon there shall be printed any false name, addition, place, or day, or whereon there shall be printed any description of the place of printing or publishing such newspaper which shall be different in any respect from the description of the house or building mentioned in the declaration required by this Act, to be made relating to such newspaper as the house or building wherein such newspaper is intended to be printed or published, every such person shall for any and every such offence forfeit the sum of twenty pounds.

had been previously ruled that in order to render the certified copy of the affidavit made by the proprietor of a newspaper evidence under the 38 Geo. 3, c. 78, it must either appear upon the jurat that the person before whom it was made had authority to take it, or this fact must appear aliunde. (b) So the delivery of a newspaper to the officer at the stamp office is a sufficient publication to sustain an indictment for a libel in the paper. (c) So proof that the defendant, as proprietor of the newspaper in which a libel is contained, accounted with the distributor of stamps for the duty on advertisements in the paper, is sufficient evidence of a publication by the defendant. (d) An affidavit according to the statute, together with the production of a newspaper, corresponding in every respect with the description of it in the affidavit, is not only evidence of the publication of such paper by the parties named, but is also evidence of its publication in the county where the printing of it is described to be. (e) The same rule applies to criminal informations. (f) Where in an action for libel in a newspaper a certified copy of the stamp office declaration was put in, which stated the title of the paper to be ‘The Leicester Herald and Midland Counties Advertiser,’ and the intended place of publication to be ‘No. 23, Charles Street, in the parish of St. Margaret, in the borough of Leicester,’ and the paper containing the libel had the same title, but the place of publication was ‘at the corner of Charles Street and Hadfield Street, in the parish of St. Margaret, in the borough of Leicester;’ Lord Denman, C.J., held that the evidence of identity was sufficient. (g) But if the affidavit from the stamp office and the paper vary in the place where the paper is stated to be printed, as where the affidavit stated it to be ‘in Union Street, Castle Street,’ and the paper ‘in Union Buildings, John Street,’ the production of the affidavit and paper is not sufficient. (h) So where the affidavit described the proprietor’s residence to be in ‘Red Lion Street, St. Ann’s Square,’ and on the paper it was described as in ‘St. Ann’s Square;’ Lord Tenterden held that as the party was not excluded from other proof of publication, if he relied on the statutory proof, he must bring himself within the statute, and that the discrepancy was fatal. though perhaps it may be enough that it should be made an exhibit, filed, and the rule drawn up on reading it. Per Little-dale, J., Reg. v. Woolmer, 12 A. & E. 422. A rule may properly be granted on an affidavit, the stamp office certificate, and the newspaper, but such rule cannot be supported unless the rule be drawn up on reading the newspaper (per Patteson, J., ibid.), for no rule is stricter than that reference can be made to nothing, upon the reading of which the rule does not appear to be drawn up.

but if he adopt any other the publication must be shown by some direct proof, as that a party bought the libel at the defendant's shop; and it is not sufficient to produce an affidavit stating merely that the defendant printed and published a libel in a certain newspaper called, &c., a copy of which libel is hereunto annexed, and to annex such copy. (k) And a newspaper may be given in evidence, though it is not one of the copies published, and though it be unstamped at the time of trial. (l)

Where in an action for libel to prove that the defendant, Harmer, was the proprietor of the 'Sun' newspaper, a certified copy of the declaration made at the stamp office under the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 6, was put in, and it was a joint declaration, and stated that, 'We are the sole proprietors; that is to say, the said James Harmer, as legal owner as mortgagee, and Murdo Young, as owner of the equity of redemption;' it was objected that this declaration showed that the defendant was a mortgagee only, and not a proprietor against whom an action for libel could be maintained; but Lord Campbell, C. J., held that the defendant was liable. (m)

Mortgagee of a newspaper.

Upon the trial the libel must in general be produced on the part of the prosecution, and, after sufficient proof of a publication by the defendant, may be read; and if the libel has merely been exhibited by the defendant, and he refuses on the trial to produce it, after notice for that purpose, parol evidence may be given of its contents. (n) The libellous matter must be set out in the indictment; (o) and the libel proved must appear to correspond with the statement of it in the indictment, and any variation in the sense between the matter charged and that proved will be fatal. (p) But the mere alteration of a single letter, so long as it does not change one word into another, will not vitiate; though the smallest variance, if it renders the meaning different, will be fatal. (q)

The libel must be produced, and must correspond with the indictment;

The libel must also be proved to have been published, by the party accused, in the county laid in the indictment. (r) But if a man write a libel in one county and consent to its publication in another, the consent is sufficient to charge him in the latter county. (s) So if a man write a libel in London, and send it by post addressed to a person in Exeter, he is guilty of a publication in Exeter. him was in Leicestershire; three of the judges held the information right: but Bayley, J., doubted. (u) From the same case it appears to have been considered that delivering a libel sealed, in order that it may be opened and published by a third person in a distant county, is a publication in the county in which it is so delivered: and further, that if delivering it open were essential, proof that the defendant wrote it in county A., and that C. delivered it unsealed to D. in county B., would be primâ facie evidence that the defendant delivered it open to C. in the county A., though there be no evidence of C.'s having been in county A. about the time; or that application had been made to D. to know of whom he received it. The information was in the county of Leicester, for writing and publishing a libel: and it was proved by the date of the letter that the defendant wrote it in that county, and that Bickersteth delivered it to Brooks for publication in the county of Middlesex, it being then unsealed. Bickersteth was not called as a witness; and there was no evidence of his having been in the county of Leicester, or how the libel came to him. The jury were told that as Bickersteth had it open, they might presume that he received it open; and that, as the defendant wrote it in the county of Leicester, it might be presumed that Bickersteth received it in that county; and three judges held against the opinion of Bayley, J., that this direction was proper; and they also held that if the delivering open could not be presumed, a delivery sealed with a view to and for the purpose of publication was a publication; and they thought there was sufficient ground for presuming some delivery, either open or sealed, in the county of Leicester. (v) It appears from this case that the dating a libel at a particular place is evidence of its having been written at that place. (w) The post-mark upon a letter has been considered as no evidence for the purpose of proving that the letter was put into the post-office at the place mentioned by such post-mark. (x) But it appears to be the better opinion that such post-marks, whether in town or country, proved to be such, are evidence that the letters on which they exist were in the offices to which the post-marks belong at the dates thereby specified. (y) But a mark of double postage having been paid on such letter is not of itself sufficient evidence that the letter contained an enclosure. (z) If a libellous letter is sent by the post, addressed to a party at a place out of the county in which the venue is laid in an indictment for the libel, yet, if it were first received by him within that county, it is a sufficient publication to support the indictment. (a) Owning the signature to a libel is no evidence in

(a) Rex v. Watson, 1 Campb. 215; and see Rex v. Middleton, 1 Str. 77. In the case of Rex v. Johnson, 7 East, 65, the publisher of a public register received an anonymous letter, tendering certain political information on Irish affairs, and requiring to know to whom letters should be directed, to which an answer was returned in the register, after which he received two letters in the same hand-what county it was signed. This was held in the celebrated case of the Seven Bishops; but additional evidence being afterwards given that the bishops applied to the Lord President of the Council about delivering a petition to the King, and that they were admitted to the King for that purpose in Middlesex, the case was left to the jury. (b) It has been held to be sufficient to prove a defendant to have published a libel without proving him to have composed it, upon a count in an information charging him with having ‘composed, printed, and published’ it. (c) So if the defendant is charged by a count in an indictment with having ‘composed, printed, and published’ a libel, if the evidence be that he only composed and published it, he may be found guilty of the composing and publishing, and acquitted of the printing. (d) Or he may be found guilty of the printing only, upon an indictment for printing and publishing, if the evidence shows him to have assisted in the printing, and to have had nothing to do with the publishing. (e)

If the libel be in a foreign language, as it is necessary that it should be set forth in the indictment in the original language, and also in an English translation, it will be necessary to prove the translation to be correct. Thus upon the trial of an information against the defendant for a libel in the French language on Napoleon Buonaparte, after a witness had proved the purchase of some copies of the book from a certain bookseller, and the bookseller had proved that the defendant was the publisher and had employed him to dispose of the copies on his account, and that he had accounted for them; an interpreter was called, who swore that he understood the French language, and that the translation was correct. The interpreter then read the whole of that which was charged to be a libel in the original; and then the translation was read by the clerk at Nisi Prius. (f)

Where an information for libel stated that the prosecutor had received certain anonymous letters, and that the defendant published a libellous placard of and concerning those letters, and the placard asked, ‘Were you not warned that your character was at stake?’ and the prosecutor stated that he should not have understood the meaning of the placard if he had not also seen the letters, and that he understood the passage in the placard to allude to the letters, it was held that the letters were admissible without proving who wrote or sent them, as the placard referred to them, and would not be intelligible without them, and that a defendant, writing directed as mentioned, and having the Irish post-mark on the envelopes, which two letters were proved to be in the handwriting of the defendant, the previous letter having been destroyed, it was held that this was a sufficient ground for the Court to have the letters read; and the letters themselves containing expressions of the writer, indicative of his having sent them to the publisher of the register in Middlesex for the purpose of publication, the whole was evidence sufficient for the jury to find a publication by the procurement of the defendant in Middlesex.

(c) Rex v. Hunt, 2 Campb. 583.

(d) Rex v. Williams, 2 Campb. 646, Lawrence, J., said, ‘There is certainly no proof that the defendant printed the libel in question; but he may be acquitted of the printing, and found guilty of the composing and publishing. His delivering the libel in his own handwriting to the printer is abundant evidence of the latter offence.’ A verdict was accordingly found and recorded of ‘Guilty, except as to printing the libel.’

who refers to other papers in his publication, must submit to have them read as explanatory of such publication. (g)

Depositions taken before a magistrate were not evidence upon a trial for a libel, under the 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 13, and 2 & 3 Ph. & M. c. 10, (h) which extended only to cases of felony. (i) But as the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, extends to misdemeanors, it should seem that such depositions would now be evidence. A Gazette is evidence to prove an averment in an information for a libel, 'that divers addresses, &c., had been presented to his Majesty by divers of his loving subjects.' (k) The King's proclamation, reciting that it had been represented that certain outrages had been committed in different parts of certain counties, and offering a reward for the discovery and apprehension of offenders, has been held admissible evidence to prove an introductory averment, in an information for a libel, that divers acts of outrage had been committed in those parts. (l) And a preamble to an Act of Parliament, reciting the existence of such outrages, and making provision against them, was also held to be admissible for the same purpose. (m)

The criminal intention of the defendant will be matter of inference from the nature of the publication. In order to constitute a libel the mind must be in fault, and show a malicious intention to defame; for, if published inadvertently, it will not be a libel: but where a libellous publication appears, unexplained by any evidence, the jury should judge from the overt act; and, where the publication contains a charge slanderous in its nature, should from thence infer that the intention was malicious. (n) It is a general rule that an act unlawful in itself, and injurious to another, is considered both in law and reason to be done malo animo towards the person injured: and this is all that is meant by a charge of malice in a declaration for libel, which is introduced rather to exclude the supposition that the publication may have been made on some innocent occasion than for any other purpose. (o) The intention may be collected from the libel, unless the mode of publication, or other circumstances, explain it: and the publisher must be presumed to intend what the publication is likely to produce; so that if it is likely to excite sedition, he must be presumed to have intended that it should have that effect. (p) Publishing what is a libel without excuse is indictable, though the publisher be free from what in common parlance is called malice; for defaming wilfully without excuse is in law malicious. And even if it could be an excuse, that the publisher held what he published to be true, it is not so if he professes to publish it quo animo the defendant published the paragraph in question. Lord Ellenborough said, 'No doubt they would be admissible in the case of an indictment; and so they would here show the intention of the party, if it were at all equivocal; but if they be not admitted for that purpose, they certainly are not admissible for the purpose of enhancing the damages.' *Stuart v. from authority. A newspaper contained this paragraph: ‘the malady under which his Majesty labours is of an alarming nature (meaning insanity); it is from authority we speak.’ At the trial of the indictment for this publication, the jury asked if a malicious intention were necessary to constitute a libel; to which Abbott, C. J., answered, that a man must have intended to do what his act was calculated to effect; and the jury found the defendant guilty. Upon a motion for a new trial it was admitted that the paragraph was libellous, but it was urged that malice was essential to make the defendant criminal; that he believed the King to have been so afflicted, and that the answer to the question by the jury was incorrect. But the Court thought otherwise, as the defendant must know if he spoke from authority, and could have proved it: and if malice were a question of fact, a man must be presumed to have intended to produce the effect which his act will naturally produce; and libelling without excuse is legal malice. (g) A person who publishes matter injurious to the character of another must be considered, in point of law, to have intended the consequences resulting from that act, (r) for every man must be presumed to intend the natural and ordinary consequences of his own act. (s) The judge, therefore, ought not to leave it as a question to the jury, whether the defendant intended to injure the person libelled, but whether the tendency of the publication was injurious to such person. (t) In some cases, however, the paper or other matter may be libellous only with reference to circumstances which should be laid before the jury by evidence.

In a case of an action for a libel contained in the 'Statesman' newspaper, subsequent publications by the defendant in the 'Statesman' newspaper were tendered in evidence to show

In order to show the existence of actual malice in the mind of the writer of a libel, other libels, whether written previously or subsequently, are admissible in evidence. (u) But where a considerable interval has elapsed between the publication of the libel complained of and subsequent statements offered as evidence of malice, the judge ought to direct the jury to consider whether these statements may not refer to something which happened subsequently to the libel, so as not to show malice at the time of the publication of the libel. (v) Where therefore the House of Lords asked the judges ‘in an action for libel, when the plea of the general issue is pleaded, and also a plea under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 1, denying actual malice, and stating the publication of an apology set forth in the plea, is it admissible upon a trial for the plaintiff to give evidence of other publications by the defendant (some of them more than six years before the publication complained of) of and concerning the plaintiff, in order to prove malice against the defendant?’ the judges answered, ‘We are all of opinion that, under such a plea, the publication of the previous libels on the plaintiff by the defendant is admissible evidence to show that the defendant wrote the libel in question with actual malice against the plaintiff. A long practice of libelling the plaintiff may show in the most satisfactory manner that the defendant was actuated by malice in the particular publication, and that it did not take place through carelessness or inadvertence; and the more the evidence approaches to the proof of a systematic practice, the more convincing it is. The circumstance that the other libels are more or less frequent, or more or less remote from the time of the publication of that in question, merely affects the weight, not the admissibility, of the evidence.' And the House of Lords held accordingly. (w)

a murder, &c.

Where an information for libel alleged that a person unknown murdered E. Grimwood, and that one Hubbard had been arrested on the charge of committing the murder and discharged, and the libel set out spoke of 'the acquittal of Hubbard for the murder of E. Grimwood;' it was held that the inducement was proved by evidence that a person had been murdered, and that Hubbard had been charged with the murder and afterwards discharged, and that at the inquest held on the body witnesses called the deceased by the name of E. Grimwood, and that this last fact might be proved by the coroner, and that he might for this purpose use an inquisition drawn up on paper. (x)

Where a declaration for libel set out the following passage: 'We would suggest to the ex-Duke of Brunswick the propriety of withdrawing into his own natural and sinister obscurity' (meaning thereby to insinuate that the plaintiff was guilty of unnatural practices), Lord Campbell, C. J., refused to permit a witness to be asked if he had read the libel, and what he understood by the word 'natural' printed in italics, as it was for the jury to form their own opinion as to what was meant by the word so printed. (y)

letter applies.

In an action for a libel it appeared that the plaintiff, an attorney, was employed by one Nash to bring an action against an executor; and that the defendant, who was employed to adjust the executor's accounts, finding that an action was about to be commenced against the executor, wrote a letter to Nash blaming him for allowing the plaintiff to sue, and containing this passage, 'If you will be misled by an attorney, who only considers his own interest, you will have to repent it; you may think when you have once ordered your attorney to write to Mr. G., he would not do any more without your further orders; but if you once set him about it, he will go any length without further orders.' And it was held that the question whether this letter applied to the plaintiff individually, or to the profession at large, was properly left to the jury. (z)

evidence.

The evidence for the defence will now depend upon the defendant's pleas; if he plead that the libellous matter is true, and that it was published for the public benefit, it will lie upon him to prove these facts; but if he plead not guilty only, then the evidence which can be adduced on his behalf at the trial will in general be confined to a very narrow compass. There may, however, be cases of a publication in point of law, where no criminal intention can be imputed to the party; as where a person delivers a letter without knowing its contents, or delivers one paper instead of another; (a) and evidence to such effect may be produced. Where, therefore, an action was brought against the porter of a coach for a libel contained in a hand-bill, which he had delivered tied up in a paper parcel, evidence was admitted that he delivered the parcel in the course of his business without any knowledge of its contents. (b) But it is not competent to the defendant to prove that a paper similar to that, for the publication of which he is prosecuted, was published on a former occasion by other persons, who have never been prosecuted for it. (c) It was held, in a case where the supposed libel was contained in a newspaper, that the defendant had a right to have read in evidence any extract from the same paper, connected with the subject of the passage charged as libellous, although disjointed from it by extraneous matter, and printed in a different character. (d) Though the defendant cannot have the assistance of counsel to examine the witnesses, and reserve to himself the right of addressing the jury, yet if he conducts his defence himself, and any point of law arises which he professes himself unable to argue, the Court will hear this argued by his counsel. (e)

If a libel imputes to a man a triable offence, proof of the truth of such imputation is inadmissible [without a plea of justification,] for it would be trying the question behind the man's back, and creating a prejudice upon it. Where a libel imputed murder to certain soldiers, evidence was offered of the truth of such imputation, and rejected: and the Court of King's Bench were unanimous that such evidence was rightly rejected; for the persons charged might afterwards come to be tried, and might be prejudiced by the previous inquiry. (f)

Where a libel stated that there was a riot at Carmarthen, and that a person fired a pistol at an assemblage of persons, and it was proposed to prove the truth of these facts in order to enable the jury to decide whether the remarks in the libel were not within the limits of free discussion, it was held that the evidence was inadmissible, for the jury were to judge upon the examination of the libel itself. (g)

Where an information for a libel states that certain transactions took place, and that the libel was published of and concerning them, and then sets out the libel as referring to them, and general evidence is given in proof of such transactions on the part of the prosecution, the defendant cannot, therefore, give evidence of the particular nature of those transactions so as to bring into issue the truth or falsehood of the libel. But if such evidence were adduced, bonâ fide, to show that the transactions referred to in the alleged libel are not the same with those which the information supposes it to have had in view, it is admissible. Verdict.

The jury may give a general verdict upon the whole matter put in issue.

It had been held in many cases, that, on trials for libels, the facts of writing, printing, or publishing, and the truth of the innuendos inserted in the proceedings, were the only matters to be submitted to the consideration of the jury: but the justice of such doctrine being questioned and ably arraigned, (i) the 32 Geo. 3, c. 60, was passed, sec. 1 of which enacts 'that on every such trial, the jury sworn to try the issue may give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty, upon the whole matter put in issue upon such indictment or information; and shall not be required or directed, by the Court or judge before whom such indictment or information shall be tried, to find the defendant or defendants guilty, merely on the proof of the publication by such defendant or defendants of the paper charged to be a libel, and of the sense ascribed to the same in such indictment or information.' By sec. 2, 'the Court, or judge before whom such indictment or information shall be tried, shall according to their or his discretion, give their or his opinion and directions to the jury, on the matter in issue between the King and the defendant or defendants, in like manner as in other criminal cases.' (k)

The judge is not bound under this Act to state whether in his opinion the writing is a libel, but he may do so.

In criminal cases the judge is to define the crime, and the jury are to find whether the party has committed that offence; this Act made it the same in cases of libel, the practice having been otherwise before. (l) It has been the course for a long time for a judge in cases of libel, as in other cases of a criminal nature, first to give a legal definition of the offence, and then to leave it to the jury to say, whether the facts necessary to constitute that offence are proved to their satisfaction; and that, whether the libel is the subject of a criminal prosecution or civil action. Whether the particular publication, the subject of inquiry, is calculated to injure the reputation of another, by exposing him to hatred, contempt, or ridicule, is a question upon which a jury is to exercise their judgment, and pronounce their opinion, as a question of fact. The judge, as a matter of advice to them in deciding that question, may give his own opinion as to the nature of the publication, but is not bound to do so. (m)

It appears to have been considered that the judge may tell the jury that they are to take the law from him, unless they are satisfied that he is wrong (n)

Judgment.

The judgment in cases of libel at common law is in the discretion of the Court, as in most other cases of misdemeanors; and usually consists of fine, imprisonment, and the finding sureties to keep the peace. (o) In some cases prior to the 56 Geo. 3, c. 138, the offender was also sentenced to the pillory. Judgment was given on each of four counts of an information that the defendant be imprisoned on the first count 'for the space of two months now

(i) See the celebrated speeches of Mr. Erskine, in the case of the Dean of St. Asaph, Ridgway's Col., pp. 234, 264, vol. 1.

(k) Sec. 3 provides that the jury may find a special verdict, in their discretion, as in other criminal cases. And sec. 4, that defendants may move in arrest of judgment as before the passing of the Act.

In the case of a blasphemous or seditious libel, the 60 Geo. 3, & 1 Geo. 4, c. 8, s. 4, made a second offence punishable by banishment from the King’s dominions, or such punishment as might be inflicted in cases of high misdemeanor; but the 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 73, s. 1, repealed ‘so much and such parts of that Act as relate to the sentence of banishment for the second offence;’ consequently the common law punishment alone remains. Most important alterations have been made in the law of libel, since the last edition, by Lord Campbell’s Act, and it has been thought best to insert it, and the decisions upon it, in this place. By that Act, (r) 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 3, (p) Gregory v. Reg. 15 Q. B. 974.

(q) A certificate of every indictment and conviction of any offender convicted of having composed, &c., any blasphemous or seditious libel, is, by sec. 2, to be given by the officer having the custody of the records, upon the request of the prosecutor on his Majesty’s behalf, to the justices of assize, &c., where such offender shall be indicted for any second offence, and is to be sufficient proof of the conviction of such offender. And in all cases in which any verdict or judgment by default shall be had against any person for publishing any blasphemous or seditious libel, the judge or court may make an order for the seizure and carrying away and detaining all copies of the libel in the possession of the party, or of any other person named in the order for his use. See secs. 1, 2, and also sec. 3, as to Scotland. Secs. 8 and 9 provide for the limitation of actions brought for anything done in the execution of the Act. By sec. 10 the punishment of persons convicted of libel in Scotland is not to be altered.

(r) Sec. 1, ‘for the better protection of private character, and for more effectually securing the liberty of the press, and for better preventing abuses in exercising the said liberty,’ enacts, ‘that in any action for defamation it shall be lawful for the defendant (after notice in writing of his intention so to do, duly given to the plaintiff at the time of filing or delivering the plea in such action), to give in evidence, in mitigation of damages, that he made or offered an apology to the plaintiff for such defamation before the commencement of the action, or as soon afterwards as he had an opportunity of doing so, in case the action shall have been commenced before there was an opportunity of making or offering such apology.’

Sec. 2, ‘In an action for a libel contained in any public newspaper or other periodical publication it shall be competent to the defendant to plead that such libel was inserted in such newspaper or other periodical publication without actual malice, and without gross negligence, and that before the commencement of the action, or at the earliest opportunity afterwards, he inserted in such newspaper or other periodical publication a full apology for the said libel, or, if the newspaper or periodical publication, in which the said libel appeared should be ordinarily published at intervals exceeding one week, had offered to publish the said apology in any newspaper or periodical publication to be selected by the plaintiff in such action; and that every such defendant shall upon filing such plea be at liberty to pay into court a sum of money by way of amends for the injury sustained by the publication of such libel, and such payment into court shall be of the same effect and be available in the same manner and to the same extent, and be subject to the same rules and regulations as to payment of costs and the form of pleading, except so far as regards the pleading of the additional facts hereinbefore required to be pleaded by such defendant, as if actions for libel had not been excepted from the personal actions in which it is lawful to pay money into court under an Act passed in the session of Parliament held in the fourth year of his late Majesty, intituled ‘An Act for the further Amendment of the Law and the

Sec. 5. ‘If any person shall maliciously publish any defamatory libel, every such person, being convicted thereof, shall be liable to fine or imprisonment or both, as the Court may award, such imprisonment not to exceed the term of one year.’

Proceedings upon the trial of an indictment or information for a defamatory libel.

Sec. 6. ‘On the trial of any indictment or information for a defamatory libel, the defendant having pleaded such plea as herein-after mentioned, the truth of the matters charged may be inquired into, but shall not amount to a defence, unless it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published; and that to entitle the defendant to give evidence of the truth of such matters charged as a defence to such indictment or information it shall be necessary for the defendant, in pleading to the said indictment or information, to allege the truth of the said matters charged in the manner now required in pleading a justification to an action for defamation, and further to allege that it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published, and the particular fact or facts by reason whereof it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published; to which plea the prosecutor shall be at liberty to reply generally, denying the whole thereof; and that if after such plea the defendant shall be convicted on such indictment or information it shall be competent to the Court, in pronouncing sentence, to consider whether the guilt of the defendant is aggravated or mitigated by the said plea, and by the evidence given to prove or to disprove the same: provided always, that the truth of the matters charged in the alleged libel complained of by such indictment or information shall in no case be inquired into without such plea of justification: provided also that, in addition to such plea, it shall be competent to the defendant to plead a plea of not guilty: provided also, that nothing in this Act contained shall take away or prejudice any defence under the plea of not guilty which it is now competent to the defendant to make under such plea to any action or indictment or information for defamatory words or libel.’

Sec. 7. ‘Whensoever, upon the trial of any indictment or information for the publication of a libel, under the plea of not guilty, evidence shall have been given which shall establish a presumptive case of publication against the defendant by the act of any other person by his authority, it shall be competent to such defendant to prove that such publication was made without his authority, consent, or knowledge, and that the said publication did not arise from want of due care or caution on his part.’

Sec. 8. ‘In the case of any indictment or information by a private prosecutor for the publication of any defamatory libel, if judgment shall be given for the defendant, he shall be entitled to recover from the prosecutor the costs sustained by the said defendant by reason of such indictment or information; and that upon a special plea of justification to such indictment or information, if the issue be found for the prosecutor, he shall be entitled to recover from the defendant the costs sustained by the prosecutor by reason of such plea, such costs so to be recovered by the defendant or prosecutor respectively to be taxed by the proper officer of the Court before which the said indictment or information is tried.’

Sec. 9. ‘Wherever throughout this Act, in describing the plaintiff or the defendant, or the party affected or intended to be affected by the offence, words are used importing the singular number or the masculine gender only, yet they shall be understood to include several persons as well as one person, and females as well as males, unless when the nature of the provision or the context of the Act shall exclude such construction.’

Where one count charged the defendants with offering to prevent the publishing, and another with threatening to publish certain matters of the prosecutor with intent to extort money, and the defendants appeared to have attempted to obtain money from the prosecutor by leading him to believe that an information for an offence relating to the post-horse duties would be laid against him, and that they would prevent it if he paid them a sum of money, it was held that the evidence did not support the counts. It has been held in Ireland that to an indictment for publishing in a newspaper ‘a certain false, defamatory, malicious and seditious libel’ concerning Her Majesty’s Government and the Parliament of the United Kingdom, with intent to create disaffection and hatred to Her Majesty’s Government and the Parliament, a special plea of justification cannot be pleaded under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 6. all, and is traversed generally, if the evidence fail as to any one of them the verdict will be entered generally against the defendant. Where, therefore, upon the trial of such an issue upon such a plea, evidence was offered in support of some only of the imputations, and the jury found that only one of the imputations upon which evidence was offered was proved, the verdict was entered for the Crown generally; for all authorities agree that there can be no partial finding for a defendant on the ground that a justification is partially established. (v)

The Court is to consider all the facts proved for and against a plea, and apportion the punishment accordingly.

By the express enactment that, wherever there is a conviction after such a plea of justification 'the Court, in pronouncing sentence,' shall 'consider whether the guilt of the defendant is aggravated or mitigated by the said plea, and by the evidence given to prove and disprove the same,' the Court is to consider the evidence on the one side and the other, and to form their own conclusion whether it aggravates or mitigates the guilt of the defendant, and they are to apportion the punishment accordingly. The evidence, as it appears on the notes of the judge who presided at the trial, comes in place of affidavits in aggravation and mitigation of punishment when sentence is to be pronounced, and by that the sentence is to be regulated, and not by any declaration of the jury as to the credit which they think ought to be given to the witnesses. (v)

Affidavits in mitigation of punishment.

In such a case the defendant may, in mitigation of punishment, show by affidavit that after the publication, but before pleading, information was given to him which, if true, would have supported an allegation in the plea, evidence having been given at the trial to account for the nonproduction of proof, but no evidence in support of the allegation itself. But where a document, which would have supported the plea, has been rejected at the trial for want of authentication by the place of custody or otherwise, its contents are not admissible in confirmation of the defendant's own affidavit that such a document was communicated to him before pleading. (x)

If a libel imputes to a man a triable offence, affidavits of its truth cannot be given in evidence in mitigation of punishment. But if a libel imports to be founded on certain newspaper reports, affidavits of the existence of such newspaper reports are admissible; and in such case affidavits of the falsehood of such reports cannot be received in aggravation. A libel imported to be founded on certain newspaper reports, and upon the foundation of those reports charged certain troops with acts of murder: after conviction the defendant offered affidavits that the newspapers did contain those reports, and also other affidavits that the facts were true. The former affidavits were received, because they explained the situation in which the defendant stood at the time he wrote the libel, and showed the impression under which he wrote; but the latter were rejected, because the receiving them might deprive of a fair trial persons who might afterwards be tried for the murders; and if murders were committed, the proper course was to prosecute and bring to a fair trial, not to libel and create an unfair prejudice. (z)

On a criminal information for libel the defendant, if he obtain a verdict, is entitled to costs under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 8, though he has not pleaded a special plea under sec. 6; and the judge cannot deprive him of costs by a certificate, the provision in the 4 & 5 Will. & M. c. 18, s. 2, on this head being superseded by the later Act. CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIFTH.

OF RIOTS, ROUTS, AND UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLIES.

[266] THE distinction between these offences appears to be, that a riot is a tumultuous meeting of persons upon some purpose which they actually execute with violence; a route is a similar meeting upon a purpose which, if executed, would make them rioters, and which they actually make a motion to execute; and an unlawful assembly is a mere assembly of persons upon a purpose which, if executed, would make them rioters, but which they do not execute, nor make any motion to execute. (a) These offences may be treated of more at large in the order in which they have been mentioned.

Of a riot.

I. A riot is described to be a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more, assembling together of their own authority, with an intent mutually to assist one another against any who shall oppose them in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually executing the same, in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful. (b)

Where the law authorizes force, an assembling will not be riotous.

In some cases, in which the law authorizes force, it is not only lawful, but also commendable, to make use of it; as for a sheriff or constable, or perhaps even for a private person, to assemble a competent number of people in order with force to suppress rebels, or enemies, or rioters; and afterwards with such force actually to suppress them; or for a justice of peace, who has a just cause to fear a violent resistance, to raise the posse, in order to remove a force in making an entry into, or detaining of, lands. Also it seems to be the duty of a sheriff, or other minister of justice, having the execution of the King's writs, and being resisted in endeavouring to execute them, to raise such a power as may effectually enable them to overpower any such resistance; yet it is said not to be lawful for them to raise a force for the execution of a civil process, unless they find a resistance; and it is certain

(a) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65, ss. 1, 8, 9. 3 Inst. 176. 4 Blac. Com. 146.

(b) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65, s. 1. Three persons or more is the correct description of the number of persons necessary to constitute a riotous meeting; but it should be observed, that in Hawkins (c. 65, ss. 2, 5, 7) the words 'more than three persons' are three times over inserted instead of 'three persons or more;' which in Burn's Just. tit. Riot, sec. 1, is remarked as an instance that, in a variety of matter, it is impossible for the mind of man to be always equally attentive. The description of riot stated in the text, and taken from the work of Mr. Serjeant Hawkins, is submitted as that which would probably be deemed most correct at the present time. It should be observed, however, that riot has been described differently by high authority. In Reg. v. Soley and others, 11 Mod. 116, Holt, C. J., said, 'The books are obscure in the definition of riots. I take it, it is not necessary to say they assembled for that purpose, but there must be an unlawful assembly; and as to what act will make a riot, or trespass, such an act as will make a trespass will make a riot. If a number of men assemble with arms, in terrorum populi, though no act is done, it is a riot. If three come out of an alehouse, and go armed, it is a riot.'

that they are highly punishable for using any needless outrage or violence. (c) [267]

It seems to be agreed, that the injury or grievance complained of, and intended to be revenged or remedied by a riotous assembly, must relate to some private quarrel only; as the enclosing of lands in which the inhabitants of a town claim a right of common, or gaining the possession of tenements the title whereof is in dispute, or such like matters relating to the interests or disputes of particular persons, in no way concerning the public. For the proceedings of a riotous assembly on a public or general account, as to redress grievances, pull down all inclosures, or to reform religion, and also resisting the King's forces, if sent to keep the peace, may amount to overt acts of high treason by levying war against the King. (d)

How far the object must be of a private nature.

It seems to be clearly agreed that in every riot there must be some such circumstances either of actual force or violence, or at least of an apparent tendency thereto, as are naturally apt to strike a terror into the people; as the show of armour, threatening speeches, or turbulent gestures; for every such offence must be laid to be done in terrorem populi. (e) But it is not necessary, in order to constitute this crime, that personal violence should have been committed. (f) If sufficient force be used to terrify a single person, it is enough, though no other persons are near enough to be within reach of the alarm. Four persons went to a cottage, in which was one old man; one of them began to knock down the end of the cottage with an axe, and knocked part of the wood-work against the old man; he caught the old man by the collar, and said, 'Come, you must go out of the house,' and he did go out, and the prisoners pulled the house to the ground, except the chimney; the jury were told that if such force was used by the four prisoners as to terrify the old man, they might find that there was a riot, and this direction was held right. (g)

As to the degree of violence or terror.

Upon these principles, assemblies at wakes, or other festival times, or meetings for the exercise of common sports or diversions, as bull-baiting, wrestling, and such like, are not riotous. (h) And upon the same ground also it seems to follow that it is possible for three persons or more to assemble together with an intention to execute a wrongful act, and also actually to perform their intended enterprise, without being rioters; as if a man assemble a number of persons to carry away a piece of timber or other thing to which he claims a right, and which cannot be carried away without a is for riotously kicking about a foot-ball in the town of Kingston; and the second, for a common nuisance in kicking about a foot-ball in the said town. And in Sir Antony Ashley's case, 1 Roll. R. 109, Coke, C. J., said, that the stage-players might be indicted for a riot and unlawful assembly; and see Dalt. Just. c. 136, (citing Roll. R.) that if such players, by their shows occasion an extraordinary and unusual concourse of people to see them act their tricks, this is an unlawful assembly and riot, for which they may be indicted and fined. 19 Vin. Abr. tit. Riots, &c. (A.) 8.

number of persons, this will not of itself be a riot, if the number of persons are not more than are necessary for the purpose; and if there are no threatening words used, nor any other disturbance of the peace; even though another man has better right to the thing carried away, and the act therefore is wrong and unlawful. (i) Where on an indictment for a riot it appeared that two men were fighting amidst a great crowd, and that some persons were aiding and assisting; but on some peace officers appearing the fight ceased, and the fighters quietly yielded to the officers: Alderson, B., held that this was not a riot. (k) Much more may any person, in a peaceable manner, assemble a fit number of persons to do any lawful thing; as to remove any common nuisance, or any nuisance to his own house or land. And he may do this before any prejudice is received from the nuisance, and may also enter into another man's ground for the purpose. Thus, where a man having erected a wear across a common navigable river, divers persons assembled with spades and other instruments necessary for removing it, and dug a trench in the land of the man who made the wear in order to turn the water and the better to remove it, and thus removed the nuisance, it was holden not to be a forcible entry nor a riot. (l)

But if there be violence and tumult, it has been generally holden not to make any difference whether the act intended to be done by the persons assembled be of itself lawful or unlawful; from whence it follows that if three or more persons assist a man to make a forcible entry into lands to which one of them has a good right of entry; or if the like number, in a violent and tumultuous manner, join together in removing a nuisance or other thing, which may be lawfully done in a peaceable manner, they are as properly rioters as if the act intended to be done by them were ever so unlawful. (m) And if in removing a nuisance the persons assembled use any threatening words (such as, they will do it though they die for it, or the like,) or in any other way behave in apparent disturbance of the peace, it seems to be a riot. (n) So where on an indictment for riot it appeared that the defendants, two of whom were bail to an action for the prosecutor, put in by bail to the sheriff before the return of the writ, had forcibly entered his house, and taken him, in order to render him, Lord Tenterden, C. J., held that, as they were not justified in doing so, they must be convicted. (o) If a large body of men assemble themselves together for the purpose of obtaining any particular end, and conduct themselves in a

(m) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65, s. 7. The law will not suffer persons to seek redress of their private grievances by such dangerous disturbances of the public peace; but the justice of the quarrel in which such an assembly may have been engaged will be considered as a great mitigation of the offence. And per cur. in 12 Mod. 648, Anon., if one goes to assert his right with force and violence, he may be guilty of a riot.

(n) Dalt. c. 137. Burn's Just. tit. Riot, s. 1, where it is said, that if there is cause to remove any such nuisance, or to do any like act, it is safest not to assemble any multitude of people, but only to send one or two persons, or if a greater number, yet no more than are needful, and only with meet tools, in order to remove it; and that such persons tend their business only, without disturbance of the peace, or threatening speeches.

(o) Rex v. Hughes, M. & M. 178, note (a).

turbulent manner, either accompanied with acts of violence, or with threats and intimidation calculated to excite the terror and alarm of the Queen's subjects, this is in itself a riot, whether the end and object proposed be a just and legitimate one or not. (p)

But the violence and tumult must in some degree be premeditated. For if a number of persons, being met together at a fair, market, or any other lawful or innocent occasion, happen on a sudden quarrel to fall together by the ears, it seems to be agreed that they are not guilty of a riot, but only of a sudden affray, of which none are guilty but those who actually engage in it; because the design of their meeting was innocent and lawful, and the subsequent breach of the peace happened unexpectedly, without any previous intention. (q) But if there be any predetermined purpose of acting with violence and tumult, the conduct of the parties may be deemed riotous. As where it was held that, although the audience in a public theatre have a right to express the feelings excited at the moment by the performance, and in this manner to applaud or to hiss any piece which is represented, or any performer who exhibits himself on the stage; yet if a number of persons, having come to the theatre with a predetermined purpose of interrupting the performance, for this purpose make a great noise and disturbance, so as to render the actors entirely inaudible, though without offering personal violence to any individual, or doing any injury to the house, they are guilty of a riot. (r)

Even though the parties may have assembled for an innocent purpose in the first instance, yet if they afterwards, upon a dispute happening to arise amongst them, form themselves into parties, with promises of mutual assistance, and then make an affray, it is said that they are guilty of a riot, because upon their confederating together with an intention to break the peace, they may as properly be said to be assembled together for that purpose from the time of such confederacy, as if their first coming had been on such a design; and it seems to be clear that if, in an assembly of persons met together on any lawful occasion whatsoever, a sudden proposal should be started of going together in a body to pull down a house, or inclosure, or to do any other act of violence, to the disturbance of the public peace, and such motion be agreed to, and executed accordingly, the persons concerned cannot but be rioters; because their associating themselves together, for such a new purpose, is in no way extenuated by their having met at first upon another. (s)

If any person, seeing others actually engaged in a riot, joins himself to them and assists them therein, he is as much a rioter as if he had at first assembled with them for the same purpose, inasmuch as he has no pretence that he came innocently into the company, but appears to have joined himself to them with an intention of seconding them in the execution of their unlawful enterprise: and it would be endless, as well as superfluous, to

How far the violence and tumult must be premeditated.

Though the parties assembled in the first instance for an innocent purpose, they may afterwards be guilty of a riot.

examine whether every particular person engaged in a riot were in truth one of the first assembly, or actually had a previous knowledge of the design. (t) And the law is that if any person encourages, or promotes, or takes part in riots, whether by words, signs, or gestures, or by wearing the badge or ensign of the rioters, he is himself to be considered a rioter; for in this case all are principals. (u) It has been ruled, however, that if three or more, being lawfully assembled, quarrel, and the party fall on one of their own company, this is no riot; but that if it be on a stranger, the very moment the quarrel begins, they begin to be an unlawful assembly, and their concurrence is evidence of an evil intention in them that concur, so that it is a riot in them that act, and in no more. (v) The inciting persons to assemble in a riotous manner appears also to have been considered as an indictable offence. (w)

Concerning some acts done in a tumultuous and riotous manner, especial provision is made by particular statutes. Sec. 12. 'If any persons, riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, shall unlawfully and with force injure or damage any such church, chapel, meeting-house, place of Divine worship, house, stable, coach-house, out-house, warehouse, office, shop, mill, malt-house, hop-oast, barn, granary, shed, hovel, fold, building, erection, machinery, engine, staith, bridge, waggon-way, or trunk, as is in the last preceding section mentioned, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years,—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour: provided that if upon the trial of any person for any felony in the last preceding section mentioned the jury shall not be satisfied that such person is guilty thereof, but shall be satisfied that he is guilty of any offence in this section mentioned, then the jury may find him guilty thereof, and he may be punished accordingly.' (y)

Conviction of this offence on trial of any offence in the preceding section.

This clause is new, and is intended to provide both for cases where there is no sufficient evidence of an intention to proceed to the total demolition of the house, &c., and also for cases where no such intent ever existed, provided there be a riot, and injury done, within the terms of the clause.

The latter part of the clause enables the jury, who try an indictment for any felony mentioned in the preceding section, to convict of the offence created by this clause if they are not satisfied that an offence within the preceding clause is satisfactorily proved. It is still necessary, however, with a view to the trial of cases under the preceding clause, to mention the decisions on the former clause in the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 8.

If rioters, after proceeding a certain length, leave off of their own accord before the act of demolition be completed, that is evidence from which a jury may infer that they did not intend to demolish the house.

If rioters desist from demolishing of their own accord, that is evidence that they did not intend to destroy the house.

A party of rioters came to a house about midnight, and in a riotous manner burst open the door, broke some of the furniture, all the windows, and one of the window frames, and then went away, there being nothing to hinder them from doing more damage; it was held that, although the breaking and damage done was a sufficient beginning to demolish the house, yet unless the jury were satisfied that the ultimate object was to destroy the house, and that, if they had carried their intentions into full effect, they would, in point of fact, have demolished it, it was not a beginning to demolish within the Act. (z) So where a mob pursued a person to a public-house, where he took refuge, and the doors and windows were all secured, and the mob demanded that he should be given up to them, or they would pull the house down, and the front door and lower windows were beaten in, and the shutters and frames of some of them much broken, and part of the mob entered the house and did much damage to the furniture,

(y) As to procurers, aiders and abettors, see ante, p. 5; and as to hard labour, &c., see ante, p. 4.

but in about twenty minutes, being unable to find the person who had there taken refuge, and a rumour being spread that the mayor was coming, they went away; it was held that this offence was not within the Act; for the persons committing the outrage must have the intention of destroying the house, before they can be charged with a felonious beginning to demolish, and here they had no such intention, but their intention was to get possession of the person who had entered the house. (a)

But if they are interrupted, the jury may infer they did intend to destroy the house.

But if rioters are interrupted in the work of demolition by the police or any other force, that is evidence to show that they were compelled to desist from that which they had designed, and the jury may well infer that they had begun to demolish within the meaning of the Act. A party of coal-whippers having a feeling of ill-will to a coal-lumper, who paid less than the usual wages, created a mob, riotously went to the house where he kept his payable, cried out that they would murder him, threw stones, brickbats, &c., broke windows and partitions, and threw down part of a wall in a yard, and continued, after his escape, throwing stones at the house, till they were compelled to desist by the threats of the police; it was held that this case was distinguishable from

R. v. Thomas, because the mob did not leave off voluntarily, but after the threats of the police, and that they might be convicted of beginning to demolish the house, though their principal object was to injure the lumper, provided it was also their object to demolish the house. (b) The beginning to pull down means not simply a demolition of a part, but a part with an intent to demolish the whole. The prisoners were indicted for beginning to demolish a building used in carrying on a trade. It appeared that they began by breaking the windows and doors, and having afterwards entered the house, they set fire to the furniture, but no part of the house was burnt. Parke, J., told the jury 'the beginning to pull down means not simply a demolition of a part, but a part with an intent to demolish the whole. It is for you to say if the prisoners meant to stop where they did, and do no more; because if they did, they are not guilty; but if they intended, when they broke the windows and doors, to go farther, and destroy the house, then they are guilty of a capital offence. If they had the full means of going farther, and were not interrupted, but left off of their own accord, it is evidence from which you may judge that they meant the work of demolition to stop where it did. If you think that they originally came there without intent to demolish, and the setting fire to the furniture was an afterthought, but with that intent, then you must acquit, because no part of the house having been burnt, there was no beginning to destroy the house. If they came originally without such intent, but had afterwards set fire to the house, then the offence would be arson. If you have doubts whether they originally came with a purpose to demolish, you may use the setting fire to the furniture under such circumstances, and in such manner, as that the necessary consequence, if not for timely interference, would have been the burning of the house, as evidence to show that they had such intent, although they began to demolish in another manner. (c) Upon an indictment under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 8, for riotously and tumultuously assembling together, and beginning to demolish a house, the jury could not convict unless they were satisfied that the prisoners intended to leave the house no house at all in fact; for if they intended to leave it still a house, though in a state however dilapidated, they were not guilty of the offence. To have left off the work of devastation without interruption would lead to the inference that the prisoners did not intend to destroy the house; but even if they were interrupted, the question still remained, what was their ultimate intention? If they had been some time at their work of ruin before they were interrupted, it was for the jury to say, looking to the nature of the things which they had destroyed, whether their purpose was to demolish the house itself. (d)

Although setting fire to a house is a substantive felony, yet if fire is made the means of attempting to destroy a house, it is as much a beginning to demolish as if any other mode of destruction were resorted to, and the indictment may be for that offence, (e) for it is impossible that there can be any greater element of destruction than fire. Whether, therefore, the intention of the parties be to demolish and destroy by pulling down the materials of a house, or by reducing the house to a useless state for habitation by the agency of fire, the offence is completely the same. (f)

If a person forms part of a riotous assembly at the time the act of demolition commences, or if he wilfully joins such riotous assembly, so as to cooperate with them whilst the act of demolition is going on, and before it is completed, in either case he comes within the description of the offence, although he may not have assisted with his own hand in the demolition of the building. (g) Where a house was demolished by rioters by means of fire, which was lighted before one o'clock in the night, and there was no evidence to show that the prisoner was present at the time when the house was set on fire, but it was proved that he was there between two and three o'clock whilst the house was burning, and whilst the mob, who set it on fire, were still there; it was held that the prisoner was properly convicted as a principal. For although it was possible, if this had been an indictment for burning the house, that the prisoner could not have been convicted as a principal, yet this was an offence under an enactment that made it felony if persons riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, and when so assembled destroyed a house; therefore it was not simply the fact of destroying a house by fire, but it was the combined fact of riotously assembling together and whilst the riot continued demolishing the house. Now to make a party guilty of that, he must be shown to be one of those who were present at the offence, or he could not be aiding and abetting. But as it was not only the burning, but also the riotously assembling together, the whole of the prisoner's conduct on that day was left to the jury; and it was distinctly left to them that unless they were satisfied that the prisoner had by his language excited the mob to the act which was the subject matter of the inquiry, and afterwards been present at it, he was not guilty. (h)

Where on an indictment under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 8, for feloniously demolishing a house, it appeared that some of the prisoners set fire to the house itself, and that others carried furniture out of the house and burnt it on the gravel walk in front of the house, the jury were directed that, in order to convict the latter, they must be satisfied that they, being on the spot at the time, were taking such steps in the transaction that they might be said to have encouraged and assisted, and by their acts to have aided and abetted, in the object and design of destroying the house. (i)

Upon an indictment on the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 8, for riotously and feloniously demolishing a house, it was a sufficient demolishing of the house if it were so far destroyed as to be no longer a house; and the fact that the rioters left the chimney standing made no difference. (h)

The 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 8, not having given any definition of what should be a riot within the meaning of that enactment, the common law definition of a riot was resorted to, and in such a case, if any one of Her Majesty's subjects were terrified, this was a sufficient terror and alarm to substantiate that part of the charge. (l)

If persons riotously assembled and demolished a house, really believing that it was the property of one of them, and acted bonâ fide in the assertion of a supposed right, this was not a felonious demolition of the house within the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 8, even though there were a riot. (m).

In order to prove that there was a beginning to demolish the house, it must be proved that some part of the freehold was destroyed; it is not therefore sufficient to prove that the window-shutters were demolished. (n)

II. By some books the notion of a rout is confined to such assemblies only as are occasioned by some grievance common to all the company; as the enclosure of land in which they all claim a right of common, &c. But, according to the general opinion, it seems to be a disturbance of the peace by persons assembling together with an intention to do a thing, which, if it be executed, will make them rioters, and actually making a motion towards the execution of their purpose. In fact, it generally agrees in all the particulars with a riot, except only in this, that it may be a complete offence without the execution of the intended enterprise. (q) And it seems, by the recitals in several statutes, that if people assemble themselves, and afterwards proceed, ride, go forth, or move by instigation of one or several conducting them, this is a rout; inasmuch as they move and proceed in rout and number. (r)

III. An unlawful assembly, according to the common opinion, is a disturbance of the peace by persons barely assembling together with an intention to do a thing which, if it were executed, would make them rioters, but neither actually executing it nor making a motion towards its execution. Mr. Serjeant Hawkins, however, thinks this much too narrow an opinion; and that any meeting of great numbers of people with such circumstances of terror as cannot but endanger the public peace, and raise fears and jealousies among the King's subjects, seems properly to be called an unlawful assembly. As where great numbers complaining of a common grievance meet together, armed in a warlike manner, in order to consult together concerning the most proper means for the recovery of their interests: for no one can foresee what may be the event of such an assembly. (s) So in recent cases it has been ruled that an assembly of great numbers of persons, which from its general appearance and accompanying circumstances is calculated to excite terror, alarm, and consternation, is generally criminal and unlawful. (t) And it has been well laid down by a very learned judge, that ‘any meeting assembled under such circumstances as, according to the opinion of rational and firm men are likely to produce danger to the tranquillity and peace of the neighbourhood, is an unlawful assembly: and in viewing this question, the jury should take into their consideration the way in which the meetings were held, the hour at which they met, and the language used by the persons assembled, and by those who addressed them: and then consider whether firm and rational men, having their families and property there, would have reasonable ground to fear a breach of the peace, as the alarm must not be merely such as would frighten any foolish or timid person, but must be such as would alarm persons of reasonable firmness and courage.’ (u) And all persons who join an assembly of this kind, disregarding its probable effect and the alarm and consternation which are likely to ensue, and all who give countenance and support to it, are criminal parties. (v)

Difference between an unlawful assembly and a riot.

The difference between a riot and unlawful assembly is this: if the parties assemble in a tumultuous manner, and actually execute their purpose with violence, it is a riot; but if they merely meet upon a purpose which, if executed, would make them rioters, and having done nothing, they separate without carrying their purpose into effect, it is an unlawful assembly. (w)

An assembly of a man's friends for the defence of his person against those who threaten to beat him if he go to such a market, &c., is unlawful; for he who is in fear of such insults must provide for his safety by demanding the surety of the peace against the persons by whom he is threatened, and not make use of such violent methods, which cannot but be attended with the danger of raising tumults and disorders to the disturbance of the public peace. But an assembly of a man's friends in his own house, for the defence of the possession of it against such as threaten to make an unlawful entry, or for the defence of his person against such as threaten to beat him in his house, is indulged by law; for a man's house is looked upon as his castle. Unlawful assemblies and seditious meetings having in many instances appeared to threaten the public tranquillity and the security of the government, several statutes have been passed for the purpose of their more immediate and effectual suppression. Statutes.

The 1 Geo. 1, st. 2, c. 5, s. 1, reciting that many rebellious riots and tumults had been in divers parts of the kingdom, to the disturbance of the public peace and the endangering of his Majesty's person and government, and that the punishments provided by the laws then in being were not adequate to such heinous offences; for the preventing and suppressing such riots and tumults, and for the more speedy and effectual punishing the offenders, enacts, 'that if any persons to the number of twelve or more, being unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously assembled together, to the disturbance of the public peace, and being required or commanded by any one or more justice or justices of the peace, or by the sheriff of the county, or his under-sheriff, or by the mayor, bailiff or bailiffs, or other head officer, or justice of the peace of any city or town corporate, where such assembly shall be, by proclamation to be made in the King's name, in the form hereinafter directed, to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations or to their lawful business, shall, to the number of twelve or more (notwithstanding such proclamation made) unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously remain or continue together by the space of one hour after such command or request made by proclamation, that then such continuing together to the number of twelve or more, after such command or request made by proclamation, shall be adjudged felony without benefit of clergy, and the offenders therein shall be adjudged felons, and shall suffer death as in case of felony without benefit of clergy.' (c)

Twelve persons or more unlawfully assembled, and not dispersing after being commanded by one justice, &c., by proclamation, to be adjudged felons.

Sec. 2, the justice of the peace, or other person authorised by the Act to make the proclamation, shall, among the said rioters, or as near to them as he can safely come, with a loud voice command, or cause to be commanded, silence to be while proclamation is making, and after that shall openly and with loud voice make, or cause to be made, proclamation in these words, or like in effect: — 'Our sovereign lord the King chargeth and commandeth all persons being assembled, immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business, upon the pains contained in the Act made in the first year of King George, for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies. God save the King.' And every justice,

And they shall carry the persons so apprehended before one or more of his Majesty's justices of the peace of the county or place where such persons shall be so apprehended, in order to their being proceeded against according to law. And the section also enacts, that if any of the persons so assembled shall happen to be killed, maimed, or hurt, in the dispersing, seizing, or apprehending them, or in the endeavour to do so, by reason of their resisting, then every such justice, &c., constable, or other peace officer, and all persons being aiding and assisting to them, shall be free, discharged, and indemnified concerning such killing, maiming, or hurting.

pressed.

By the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79, s. 1, reciting that divers societies had been instituted in this kingdom and in Ireland, of a new and dangerous nature, inconsistent with public tranquillity, and with the existence of regular government, particularly certain societies calling themselves 'Societies of United Englishmen, United Scotsmen, United Britons, United Irishmen, and The London Corresponding Society,' and that it was expedient and necessary that all such societies, and all societies of the like nature, should be utterly suppressed and prohibited, as unlawful combinations and confederacies, highly dangerous to the peace and tranquillity of these kingdoms, and to the constitution of the government thereof, as by law established, it is enacted, 'That all the said societies of United Englishmen, United Scotsmen, United Irishmen, and United Britons, and the said society commonly called the London Corresponding Society, and all other societies called Corresponding Societies, of any other city, town, or place, shall be, and the same are hereby utterly suppressed and prohibited, as being unlawful combinations and confederacies against the government of our sovereign lord the King, and against the peace and security of his Majesty's liege subjects.'

which shall take unlawful oaths, &c., or where the names of some of the members, &c., shall be kept secret, or where there are divisions, or branch societies, are unlawful combinations and confederacies.

Sec. 2, the said societies, and every other society then established, or hereafter to be established, the members whereof shall, according to the rules thereof, or to any provision or agreement for that purpose, be required or admitted to take any oath or engagement which shall be an unlawful oath or engagement, within the intent or meaning of the 37 Geo. 3, c. 123, (q) or to take any oath not required nor authorized by law; and every society the members whereof, or any of them, shall take, or in any manner bind themselves by any such oath or engagement, on becoming, or in consequence of being members of such society: and every society, the members whereof shall take, subscribe, or assent to any test or declaration not required by law, or not authorized in manner hereinafter mentioned; and every society of which the names of the members, or any of them, shall be kept secret from the society at large, or which shall have any committee, or select body so chosen or appointed, that the members constituting the same shall not be known by the society at large, to be members of such committee, or select body; or which shall have any president, &c., or other officer, so chosen and appointed, that the election or appointment shall not be known to the society at large, or of which the names of all the members, and of all committees or select bodies of members, and of all presidents, &c., shall not be entered in a book to be kept for that purpose, and open to the inspection of all the members; and every society which shall be composed of different divisions or branches, or of different parts, acting in any manner separately or distinct from each other, or of which any part shall have any separate or distinct president, &c., or other officer, elected or appointed by, or for such part, or to act as an officer for such part: shall be deemed and taken to be unlawful combinations and confederacies. (r) And further, that every person who shall directly or indirectly maintain correspondence or intercourse with any such society, or with any division, branch, committee, or other select body, president, &c., or other officer, or member thereof as such, or who shall by contribution of money or otherwise, aid, abet, or support such society, or any members or officers thereof, as such, shall be deemed guilty of an unlawful combination and confederacy.

Persons corresponding with such societies, or aiding them, guilty of an unlawful combination and confederacy.

The Act shall not extend to declarations approved by two justices, and registered with the clerk of the peace; but such approbation shall only remain valid till the next general session, unless the same shall be confirmed by the major part of the justices at such general session. (s) And it shall not extend to the meetings of societies, or lodges of Freemasons, which, before the passing of the Act, had been usually held, under the denomination of 'Lodges of Freemasons,' and in conformity to the rules prevailing among such societies; (t) provided that there be a certificate of two of the members upon oath, that such society or lodge had been usually held under such denomination, and in conformity to such rules; the certificate duly attested, &c., being, within two months after the passing of the Act, deposited with the clerk of the peace, with whom also the name or denomination of the society or lodge, and the usual place and time of meeting, and the names and descriptions of the members are to be registered yearly. (u) The clerk of the peace is required to enrol such certificate and registry, and to lay the same once in every year before the general session of the justices; and the justices may upon complaint, upon oath, that the continuance of the meetings of any such lodge or society is likely to be injurious to the public peace and good order, direct them to be discontinued; and any such meeting, held notwithstanding such order of discontinuance, and before the same shall, by the like authority, be revoked, shall be deemed an unlawful combination and confederacy under the provisions of the Act. (v)

The Act not to extend to declarations approved by two justices, nor to lodges of Freemasons, where there is a certificate and registry.

The justices may order the meetings to be discontinued, &c.

Sec. 8. 'Every person who, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall, in breach of the provisions thereof, be guilty of any such unlawful combination and confederacy as in this Act is described, shall and may be proceeded against for such offence in a summary way, either before one or more justice or justices of the members or officers thereof, in which society or at which meeting no business whatever is transacted other than that which directly and immediately relates to the objects of the society as declared in the rules thereof, and set forth in the certified copy thereof. Provided that the trustees or other officers of the society, when required under the hands of two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, shall give full information to such justices of the nature, objects, proceedings, and practices of such society, and in default thereof the provisions of the Acts herein recited shall be in force in respect of such society.

Justices may mitigate the punishment.

Persons once prosecuted, are not liable to other prosecutions.

Offenders may be indicted, if not prosecuted, under this Act.

But the justice or justices, before whom any person shall be convicted of any unlawful combination or confederacy, may mitigate the punishment, so as it be not thereby reduced to less than one-third of the punishment by the Act directed to be inflicted, whether by imprisonment or fine. (x) And it is provided, that any person who shall be convicted or acquitted by any justice, upon a summary prosecution, shall not afterwards be prosecuted by indictment, or otherwise, for the same offence; and in like manner that any person convicted, or acquitted, upon an indictment, shall not afterwards be prosecuted before any justice in a summary way. (y) But the Act is not to extend to prevent any prosecution by indictment or otherwise, for anything which shall be an offence within the intent and meaning of the Act, and which might have been so prosecuted if the Act had not been made, unless the offender shall have been prosecuted for such offence under the Act, and convicted or acquitted of such offence. justices of the peace against any person or persons for the recovery of any fine or forfeiture incurred under the provisions of either of the said Acts,' unless the same is commenced, &c., in the name of the law officers of the Crown. Query, whether this affects this section or the 57 Geo. 3, c. 19; post, p. 396.

Where an indictment alleged that there was an unlawful meeting of the defendant and of divers other persons unknown, for the purpose of unlawfully practising military exercise, and which persons so met and assembled were there without any lawful authority of the Queen, &c., and that the defendant was present at and unlawfully did attend the said meeting for the purpose of unlawfully training and drilling divers persons unknown to the practice of military exercise; Maule, J., held that the indictment was not bad for charging two offences. (d)

An indictment upon this Act should aver that the meeting was for the purpose of training and drilling, or of being trained and drilled to the use of arms, or for the purpose of practising military exercises, movements, or evolutions, and that the meeting was held without any lawful authority from Her Majesty, or the lieutenant, or two justices of the peace, &c., by commission or otherwise. (e)

The 57 Geo. 3, c. 19, and 60 Geo. 3 & 1 Geo. 4, c. 6, contained

Meetings for the purpose of military exercise prohibited; and persons attending such meetings, for the purpose of training others, or aiding therein, liable to be transported or imprisoned, &c.

But the 57 Geo. 3, c. 19, contains also several enactments relating to meetings and assemblies of persons which are not of a limited duration.

No meetings certain days, within a mile of Westminster Hall.

Sec. 23, reciting, that it is highly inexpedient that public meetings or assemblies should be held near the houses of Parliament, or near the courts of justice in Westminster Hall, on certain days, enacts, that it shall not be lawful for any person to convene, or to give any notice for convening, any meeting consisting of more than fifty persons, or for any number of persons exceeding fifty to meet in any street, square, or open place, in the city or liberties of Westminster, or county of Middlesex, within the distance of a mile from the gate of Westminster Hall (except such parts of the parish of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, as are within such distance), for the purpose of considering of or preparing any petition, &c., for alteration of matters in church or state, on any day on which the two houses, or either house of Parliament, shall meet and sit, nor on any day on which the courts shall sit in Westminster Hall. And that if any meeting or assembly for such purposes shall be assembled or holden on such day, it shall be deemed an unlawful assembly. But there is a provision that the enactment shall not apply to any meeting for the election of members of Parliament, or to persons attending upon the business of either house of Parliament, or any of the said courts.

Sec. 24 recites, that divers societies and clubs had been instituted in the metropolis, and in various parts of the kingdom, of a dangerous nature and tendency, inconsistent with the public tranquillity and the existence of the established government, laws, and constitution, of the kingdom; and that the members of many such societies or clubs had taken unlawful oaths and engagements of fidelity and secrecy, and had taken or subscribed or assented to illegal tests and declarations; and that many of these societies or clubs appointed or employed committees, delegates, &c., to confer or correspond with other societies or clubs, and to induce other persons to become members; and by such means maintained an influence over large bodies of men, and deluded many ignorant and unwary persons into the commission of acts highly criminal: and recites also, that certain societies or clubs, calling themselves Spenceans, or Spencean Philanthropists, professed for their object the confiscation and division of the land, and the extinction of the funded property of the kingdom; and that it was expedient and necessary that they should be utterly suppressed and prohibited as unlawful combinations and confederacies highly dangerous to the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom, and to the constitution of its government; and then it enacts, 'that all societies or clubs calling themselves Spenceans, or Spencean Philanthropists, and all other societies or clubs, by whatever name or description the same are called or known, who hold and profess, or who shall hold and profess, the same objects

And also concerning Spencean societies or clubs, &c.

Spencean societies or clubs, &c., suppressed and prohibited and doctrines, shall be, and the same are hereby utterly suppressed and prohibited, as being unlawful combinations and confederacies against the government of our sovereign lord the King, and against the peace and security of his Majesty's liege subjects.'

Sec. 25. 'All and every the said societies or clubs, and also all and every other society or club now established, or hereafter to be established, the members whereof shall be required or admitted to take any oath or engagement which shall be an unlawful engagement within the meaning of the 37 Geo. 3, c. 123, (ee) or within the meaning of the 52 Geo. 3, c. 104, (f) or to take any oath not required or authorized by law; and every society or club, the members whereof, or any of them, shall take or in any manner bind themselves by any such oath or engagement, on becoming, or in order to become, or in consequence of being a member or members of such society or club; and every society or club, the members or any member whereof shall be required or admitted to take, subscribe, or assent to, or shall take, subscribe, or assent to, any test or declaration not required or authorized by law, in whatever manner or form such taking or assenting shall be performed, whether by words, signs, or otherwise, either on becoming or in order to become, or in consequence of being a member or members of any such society or club; and every society or club that shall elect, appoint, nominate, or employ any committee, delegate or delegates, representative or representatives, missionary or missionaries, to meet, confer, or communicate with any other society or club, or with any committee, delegate or delegates, representative or representatives, missionary or missionaries, of such other society or club, or to induce or persuade any person or persons to become members thereof, shall be deemed and taken to be unlawful combinations and confederacies, within the meaning of the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79, (g) and shall and may be prosecuted, proceeded against, and punished, according to the provisions of the said Act; and every person who, from and after the passing of this Act, shall become a member of any such society or club, or who, after the passing of this Act, shall act as a member thereof, and every person who, from and after the passing of this Act, shall directly or indirectly maintain correspondence or intercourse with any such society or club, or with any committee or delegate, representative or missionary, or with any officer or member thereof, as such, or who shall, by contribution of money, or otherwise, aid, abet, or support, such society or club, or any members or officers thereof, as such, shall be deemed guilty of an unlawful combination and confederacy within the intent and meaning of the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79, and shall and may be proceeded against, prosecuted, and punished, according to the provisions of the said Act, with regard to the prosecution and punishment of unlawful combinations and confederacies.' (h)

Nothing contained in this Act is to extend to lodges of Freemasons, complying with the regulations of the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79; (h) nor to any declaration approved and subscribed by two or more justices of the peace, and confirmed by the major part of the

as unlawful combinations and confederacies.

Societies taking unlawful oaths, &c., or electing committees, delegates, &c., deemed unlawful combinations and confederacies.

justices at a general session, or at a general quarter sessions of the peace, pursuant to the regulations in the said Act of the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79; (h) nor to meetings of Quakers; nor to any meeting or society for purposes of a religious or charitable nature only, and in which no other matter or business shall be discussed. (l)

Offence of persons permitting unlawful meetings.

Any person knowingly permitting any meeting of any society, or club, declared by this Act to be an unlawful combination or confederacy, or of any division or committee of such society or club, to be held in any place belonging to him, or in his possession or occupation, is made liable, for the first offence, to a forfeiture of five pounds; and for any offence committed after the conviction for such first offence is to be deemed guilty of an unlawful combination and confederacy in breach of this Act. (m) And two justices, upon evidence on oath that any such meeting, or any meeting for any seditious purpose, has been held at any house, &c., licensed for the sale of liquors, with the knowledge and consent of the persons keeping such house, &c., may adjudge the license to be forfeited. (n)

Licences of houses where held to be forfeited.

Recovery of penalties, and limitation of actions.

The thirtieth and three following sections relate to the recovery of the pecuniary penalties, which may be incurred under the Act, their application and the limitation of actions against justices, &c., for anything done in pursuance of the Act. Penalties exceeding £20 may be recovered by action of debt; and those not exceeding £20 may be recovered before a justice in a summary way. (o)

Act not to affect other provisions made by law: and by sec. 36, not to operate against persons not having acted as members after passing of Act.

Sec. 35, nothing contained in the Act shall be deemed to take away, or abridge, any provision already made by the law of the realm, for the suppression or punishment of any offence described in the Act. And sec. 36, no person shall be prosecuted, under the Act, for having been a member of any illegal society, if such person shall not have acted as a member, after the passing of the Act; but that the Act shall not extend to prevent any prosecution, by indictment or otherwise, for anything which shall be an offence within the Act, and which might have been so prosecuted, if the Act had not been made.

Sec. 36, also provides that no person prosecuted and convicted, or acquitted, of any offence against the Act, shall be liable to be again prosecuted for the same offence.

The attorney-general or lord advocate may stay proceedings.

Sec. 37, where any proceeding or prosecution shall be instituted for any offence against the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79, or this Act, either by action or information, before any justice or justices, or otherwise, the attorney-general in England, or the lord advocate in Scotland, may order them to be stayed; and, in case of any judgment or conviction, one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state may, by an order under his hand, stay the execution of such judgment or conviction, or mitigate, or remit, any fine or forfeiture, or any part thereof. Several statutes have been passed for the purpose of regulating places used for delivering lectures, and holding debates: but the enactments contained in them are for the most part of limited duration.

Of places used for lectures and debates.

Many of the sections of the 36 Geo. 3, c. 8, were intended to remedy the evil occasioned by persons who, under pretence of delivering lectures and discourses on public grievances, delivered lectures and discourses, and held debates, tending to stir up hatred and contempt of the King's person and government, and of the constitution: but this statute was limited to a duration of three years from the passing of the Act, and until the end of the then next session of Parliament. It is referred to in the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79, s. 15, (r) which, reciting that divers places had been used for lectures or debates, which were not within the former Act, but which lectures or debates had in many instances been of a seditious and immoral nature, and that other places had been used for seditious and immoral purposes, under the pretence of being places of meeting for the purpose of reading books, pamphlets, newspapers, or other publications, enacts, that every house, room, field, or other place at or in which any lecture or discourse shall be publicly delivered, or any public debate shall be had on any subject whatever, for the purpose of raising or collecting money, or any other valuable thing, from the persons admitted; or to which any person shall be admitted by payment of money, or by any ticket or token of any kind, delivered in consideration of money or other valuable thing, or in consequence of paying or giving, or having paid or given, or having agreed to pay or give, in any manner, any money or other valuable thing; or where any money or other valuable thing shall be received from any person admitted, either under pretence of paying for any refreshment, or other thing, or under any other pretence, or for any other cause, or by means of any device or contrivance whatever; and every house, &c., which shall be opened or used as a place of meeting, for the purpose of reading books, pamphlets, newspapers, or other publications, and to which any person shall be admitted by payment of money, or by any ticket, &c. (as before) shall be deemed a disorderly house or place, within the 36 Geo. 3, unless the same shall have been previously licensed in the manner afterwards mentioned in the Act. And the persons by whom such house, &c., shall be opened or used, are to forfeit £100 for every time of opening or using, and be otherwise punished as the law directs in cases of disorderly houses; and every person conducting the proceedings, debating, or furnishing books, &c.; and also every person giving or receiving money, &c., in respect of the admission to any such house, &c., or delivering out, or receiving, any tickets or tokens, knowing such house, &c., to be opened or used for any such purpose, is, for every such offence, to forfeit twenty pounds.

Who are liable as persons opening houses, &c.

Justices, suspecting any place to be opened for lectures, &c., may demand admittance, &c.

As to licenses for lectures, &c., and the power of justices to demand admittance to places licensed.

By the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79, s. 16, any person appearing as master, or as having the management of any such house, &c., shall be deemed to be a person by whom the same is opened, or used, and liable to be sued or prosecuted, though not the real owner or occupier. A power is also given to any justice who shall, by information upon oath, have reason to suspect that any house, &c., is opened or used for lectures, debates, reading, &c., contrary to the Act, to go to such house, &c., and demand to be admitted; and, in case of admittance being refused, such house, &c., is to be deemed a disorderly house or place within this Act and the 36 Geo. 3, and the provisions in both the Acts are to be applied to such house, &c., where such admittance shall have been so refused; and every person refusing is to forfeit twenty pounds. (s)

Sec. 18, relates to the licensing any place for lecturing, or reading, by two or more justices at their general sessions, or at a special session held for the purpose; but gives a power to the justices at any general sessions to revoke such license. And any justice may demand admittance to any licensed place; and, in case of refusal, such place is to be deemed, notwithstanding the license, a disorderly house or place, within the Act; and every person refusing such admittance is to forfeit twenty pounds. (t) Any two justices upon evidence, on oath, that any licensed place is commonly used for lectures or discourses of a seditious or immoral tendency, or that books, &c., of a seditious or immoral nature are there commonly kept, and delivered to be read, may declare the license to have been forfeited. (u) Every house, &c., licensed for the sale of ale, or liquors, is to be deemed licensed for reading within the Act: but two or more justices on evidence, on oath, that seditious or immoral publications are usually distributed there for the purpose of being read, may declare the license for selling ale, or liquors, to have been forfeited. (v)

The Act not to extend to certain places.

Prosecutions limited.

Tumultuous petitioning.

The Act is not to extend to lectures delivered in the universities by members, &c., or to lectures delivered in the hall of any of the inns of court by persons authorised; and payments to schoolmasters are not to be deemed payments for admission to lectures within the Act. (w) And prosecutions for any penalty imposed by the Act are to be commenced within three months after it shall have been incurred. (x)

The 13 Car. 2, c. 5, reciting the mischiefs of tumultuous petitioning, enacts, that no person shall solicit or procure the getting of hands or other consent of any persons above the number of twenty, to any petition, &c., to the King or the houses of Parliament, for alteration of matters established by law in church or state, unless the matter thereof shall have been first consented unto and ordered by three justices, or by the major part of the grand jury of the county, &c., at the assizes or quarter sessions; or, in London, by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council: and that no person shall repair to his Majesty or the houses of Parliament, upon pretence of presenting or delivering any petition, &c., accompanied with excessive number of people, nor at any one time with above the number of ten persons; upon pain of incurring a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds, and three months' imprisonment for every offence; such offence to be prosecuted in the Court of King's Bench, or at the assizes or quarter sessions, within six months, and proved by two credible witnesses. (y) But there is a proviso, that the Act shall not hinder persons, not exceeding twenty in number, from presenting any public or private grievance or complaint to any member of Parliament, or to the King, for any remedy to be thereupon had; nor extend to any address to his Majesty by the members of the houses of Parliament, during the sitting of Parliament. (z)

The common law, and also several more ancient statutes than those which have been mentioned, authorize proceedings for the restraining and suppression of riots. By the common law the sheriff, under-sheriff, constable, or any other peace officer, may, and ought to do, all that in them lies towards the suppressing of a riot, and may command all other persons to assist them; and by the common law also any private person may lawfully endeavour to appease such disturbances by staying the persons engaged from executing their purpose, and also by stopping others coming to join them. (a) It has been holden also, that private persons may arm themselves in order to suppress a riot; (b) from whence it seems clearly to follow that they may also make use of arms in suppressing it, if there be a necessity. However, it may be very hazardous for private persons to proceed to these extremities; and such violent methods seem only proper against such riots as savour of rebellion. (c) But if a felony be about to be committed, the interference of private persons will be justifiable; for a private person may do anything to prevent the perpetration of a felony. (d) In the riots which took place in the year 1780, this matter was much misunderstood, and a general persuasion prevailed that no indifferent person could interpose without the authority of a magistrate; in consequence of which much mischief was done, which might otherwise have been prevented. (e)

Upon an information against the Mayor of Bristol for neglect of duty in not suppressing the Bristol riots in 1831, which was tried at the bar of the King's Bench, it was laid down that the general rules of law require of magistrates, that at the time of riots, they should keep the peace, restrain the rioters, and pursue and take them; and to enable them to do this, they may call on all the King's subjects to assist them, which they are bound to do upon reasonable warning; and in point of law, a magistrate would be justified in giving firearms to those who thus came to assist him, but it would be imprudent in him to give them to those who might not know their use, and who might be under no control, and who, not being used to act together, might be cut off from the rest of the force, and the arms, by those means, get into the hands of the rioters. (f)

It was contended, that this article had virtually repealed the statute 13 Car. 2, c. 5, but Lord Mansfield declared it to be the unanimous opinion

It is no part of the duty of a magistrate to go out and head the constables, or to marshal and arrange them; neither is it any part of his duty to hire men to assist him in putting down a riot: nor to keep a body of men, as a reserve, to act as occasion may require; neither is he bound to call out the Chelsea Pensioners, any more than any of the rest of the King's subjects: nor is it any part of his duty to give any orders respecting the fire arms in gunsmiths' shops. Nor is a magistrate bound to ride with the military; if he gives the military officer orders to act, that is all that is required of him. (g)

(g) Rex v. Pinney, ibid. The duties of private persons, soldiers, sheriffs, and peace officers in such cases were most clearly and elaborately expounded by Lord C. J. Tindal, in his charge to the Bristol grand jury [1832, 5 C. & P. 261] as follows:—'By the common law every private person may lawfully endeavour, of his own authority, and without any warrant or sanction of the magistrate, to suppress a riot by every means in his power. He may disperse, or assist in dispersing, those who are assembled; he may stay those who are engaged in it from executing their purpose; he may stop and prevent others whom he shall see coming up from joining the rest; and not only has he the authority, but it is his bounden duty as a good subject of the King to perform this to the utmost of his ability. If the riot be general and dangerous, he may arm himself against the evil doers to keep the peace.' 'It would undoubtedly be more prudent to attend, and be assistant to the justices, sheriffs, or other ministers of the King in doing this; for the presence and authority of the magistrate would restrain the proceeding to such extremities until the danger were sufficiently immediate, or until some felony was either committed, or could not be prevented without recourse to arms; and at all events the assistance given by men who act in subordination and concert with the civil magistrate will be more effectual to attain the object proposed than any efforts, however well intended, of separated and disunited individuals. But if the occasion demands immediate action, and no opportunity is given for procuring the advice or sanction of the magistrate, it is the duty of every subject to act for himself, and upon his own responsibility in suppressing a riotous and tumultuous assembly; and he may be assured that whatever is honestly done by him in the execution of that object will be supported and justified by the common law. The law acknowledges no distinction in this respect between the soldier and the private individual. The soldier is still a citizen, lying under the same obligation, and invested with the same authority to preserve the peace of the King as any other subject. If the one is bound to attend the call of the civil magistrate, so is the other; if the one may interfere for that purpose when the occasion demands it, without the requisition of the magistrate, so may the other too; if the one may employ arms for that purpose, when arms are necessary, the soldier may do the same. Undoubtedly the same exercise of discretion which requires the private subject to act in subordination to and in aid of the magistrate, rather than upon his own authority, before recourse is had to arms, ought to operate in a stronger degree with a military force. But where the danger is pressing and immediate, where a felony has actually been committed, or cannot otherwise be prevented, and from the circumstances of the case no opportunity is offered of obtaining a requisition from the proper authorities, the military subjects of the King not only may, but are bound to do their utmost, of their own authority, to prevent the perpetration of outrage, to put down riot and tumult, and to preserve the lives and property of the people. Still further, by the common law, not only is each private subject bound to exert himself to the utmost, but every sheriff, constable, and other peace officer, is called upon to do all that in them lies for the suppression of riot, and each has authority to command all other subjects of the King to assist him in that undertaking. By an early statute (13 Hen. 4, c. 7) any two justices, with the sheriff or under-sheriff of the county, may come with the power of the county, if need be, to arrest any rioters, and shall arrest them; and they have power to record that which they see done in their presence against the law; by which record the offenders shall be convicted, and may afterwards be

The 34 Edw. 3, c. 1, empowers justices of the peace to restrain and arrest rioters; and, having been construed liberally, it has been resolved, that a single justice may arrest persons riotously assembled, and may also authorize others to arrest them by a parol command. By the 13 Hen. 4, c. 7, s. 1, the justices of the peace, three or two of them at the least, and the sheriff or under-sheriff of the county where any riot, assembly, or rout of people against the law shall be made, shall come with the power of the county (if need be) to arrest them; and shall arrest them; and shall have power to record that which they shall find so done in their presence against the law: and by such record the offenders shall be convicted in the same manner as is contained in the statute of forcible entries. (h) In the interpretation of this statute it has been holden, that all persons, noblemen and others, except women, clergymen, persons decrepit, and infants under fifteen, are bound to attend the justices in suppressing a riot, upon pain of fine and imprisonment; and that any battery, wounding, or killing the rioters, that may happen in suppressing the riot, is justifiable. (i)

Suppression of riots. By statutes.

An indictment for a riot must show for what act the rioters assembled, that the Court may judge whether it was lawful or not: (k) and it must state that the defendants unlawfully assembled; for a riot is a compound offence: there must be not only an unlawful act to be done, but an unlawful assembly of more than two persons. (l) In a case where six persons being indicted for a riot, two of them died without being tried, two were acquitted, and the other two were found guilty, the Court refused to arrest the judgment, saying, that as the jury had found two persons to be guilty of a riot, it must have been together with those two who had never been tried, as it could not otherwise have been a riot. (m) But as two persons only cannot be guilty of a riot, it was held, that where several were indicted, and all but two were acquitted, no judgment could be given against the two. (n) And though the indictment in this case charged a battery upon an individual as well as a riot, and it was argued that the riotose, &c., was only to express the manner of the assault, and a kind of aggravation of the offence, it was held that the two persons could not be intended to be guilty of the battery; that the offence was special and laid as a riot, the riotose extending to all the facts, and the battery being but part of the riot; so that the defendants being acquitted of the riot were acquitted of the whole of which brought to punishment. And here I must distinctly observe, that it is not left to the choice or will of the subject, as some have erroneously supposed, to attend or not to the call of the magistrate, as they think proper, but every man is bound, when called upon, under pain of fine and imprisonment, to yield a ready and implicit obedience to the call of the magistrate, and to do his utmost in assisting him to suppress any tumultuous assembly. See Reg. v. they were indicted. But it was also held, that if the indictment had been, that the defendants, with divers other disturbers of the peace, had committed this riot and battery, and the verdict had been as in this case, the King might have had judgment. (o)

If an indictment for a riot and assault do not conclude in terrorem populi, and there be no evidence of an assault, the defendants must be acquitted: (p) but if such an indictment charge the defendants with a riot and cutting down fences, they may be convicted of an unlawful assembly, notwithstanding the want of such a conclusion. (q) An indictment, however, upon the 1 Geo. 1, st. 2, c. 5, s. 1, for remaining assembled one hour after proclamation has been made, need not charge the riot to have been in terrorem populi. (r)

Evidence upon an indictment for a conspiracy in unlawfully assembling, &c., to excite discontent and disaffection.

Upon an indictment against H. Hunt and others, for a conspiracy, and unlawfully meeting together with persons unknown, for the purpose of exciting discontent and disaffection, at which meeting H. Hunt was the chairman, it was holden, that resolutions passed at a former meeting assembled a short time before, in a distant place, but at which H. Hunt also presided, and the avowed object of which meeting was the same as that of the meeting mentioned in the indictment, were admissible in evidence, to show the intention of H. Hunt in assembling and attending the meeting in question. And it was holden that a copy of these resolutions delivered by H. Hunt to the witness at the time of the former meeting, as the resolutions then intended to be proposed, and which corresponded with those which the witness heard read from a written paper, was admissible, without producing the original. (s)

In the same case it appeared, that large bodies of men had come to the meeting in question from a distance, marching in regular order resembling a military march: and it was holden to be admissible evidence, to show the character and intention of the meeting, that within two days of the time at which it took place considerable numbers were seen training and drilling before day-break, at a place from which one of these bodies had come to the meeting; and that, upon their discovering the persons who saw them, they ill-treated them, and forced one of them to take an oath never to be a king's man again. And it was also admitted as evidence for the same purpose, that another body of men in their progress to the meeting, on passing the house of the person who had been so ill-treated, expressed their disapprobation of his conduct by hissing. (t)

It was decided in this case, that parol evidence of inscriptions and devices on banners and flags displayed at a meeting is admissible without producing the originals. (u)

And that upon the indictment in question evidence of the supposed misconduct of those who dispersed the meeting was not admissible. (v)

Where the question was, with what intention a great number of persons assembled to drill; declarations made by those assembled and in the act of drilling, and further declarations made by others who were proceeding to the place, and solicitations made by them to others to accompany them declaratory of their object, were held to be admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing their object. (w) And in general, evidence is admissible to show that the meeting caused alarm and apprehension, and to prove information given to the civil authorities, and the measures taken by them in consequence of such information. (x)

Declarations of the parties assembling.

It was held by the judges, (y) on the special commission of 1830, 1831, at Salisbury, that the prisoners must first be identified as forming part of the crowd before the riot is proved, and the fifteen judges confirmed the holding of the special commission. (z) But this is a very inconvenient course, and causing much waste of time by recalling witnesses; and it has since been held that in riot, the prosecutor is entitled to prove the acts of any of the rioters before he connects the others with the riot, (a) and this is in conformity with the practice in cases of conspiracy. (b)

Where several were indicted for a riot, it was moved, that the prosecutor might name two or three, and try it against them, and that the rest might enter into a rule to plead not guilty (guilty if the others were found guilty); and a rule was made accordingly; this being to prevent the charges in putting them all to plead. (c)

The punishment for offences of the nature of riots, routs, or unlawful assemblies, at common law, is fine and imprisonment, in proportion to the circumstances of the offence: (d) and formerly, in cases of great enormity, it appears that the offenders were sometimes punished with the pillory; (e) but such punishment is now taken away by the 56 Geo. 3, c. 138.

Punishment.

And by the 3 Geo. 4, c. 114, whenever any person shall be convicted of a riot, 'it shall and may be lawful for the Court before which any such offender shall be convicted, or which by law is authorized to pass sentence upon any such offender, to award and order, if such Court shall think fit, sentence of imprisonment, with hard labour, for any term, not exceeding the term for which such Court may now imprison for such offences, either in addition to or in lieu of any other punishment which may be inflicted on any such offenders, by any law in force before the passing of this Act; and every such offender shall thereupon suffer such sentence, in such place, and for such time as aforesaid, as such Court shall think fit to direct.'

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SIXTH.

OF AFFRAYS.

[291] AFFRAYS are the fighting of two or more persons in some public place, to the terror of his Majesty's subjects. (a). The derivation of the word affray is from the French effrayer, to terrify; and as in a legal sense it is taken for a public offence to the terror of the people, it seems clearly to follow that there may be an assault which will not amount to an affray: as where it happens in a private place, out of the hearing or seeing of any except the parties concerned, in which case it cannot be said to be to the terror of the people. (b) Thus, where two of the prisoners had fought together amidst a great crowd of persons, and the others were present aiding and assisting, at a place a considerable distance from any highway, and the fight ceased on the appearance of some peace officers, it was held that this was not an affray; for an affray must occur in some public place, and this was to all intents and purposes a private one. (c) And there may be an affray which will not amount to a riot, though many persons be engaged in it: as if a number of persons, being met together at a fair or market, or on any other lawful or innocent occasion, happen on a sudden quarrel to fall together by the ears, it seems agreed that they will not be guilty of a riot, but only of a sudden affray, of which none are guilty but those who actually engage in it; and this on the ground of the design of their meeting being innocent and lawful, and the subsequent breach of the peace happening unexpectedly without any previous intention. (d) An affray differs also from a riot in this, that two persons only may be guilty of it: whereas three persons at least are necessary to constitute a riot, as has been shown in the preceding chapter.

Aggravated
affrays.

An affray may be much aggravated by the circumstances under which it takes place, either—first, in respect of its dangerous tendency; secondly, in respect of the persons against whom it is committed; or, thirdly, in respect of the place in which it happens.

An affray may receive an aggravation from its dangerous tendency; as where persons coolly and deliberately engage in a duel which cannot but be attended with the apparent danger of murder, and is not only an open defiance of the law, but carries with it a

(b) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 63, sec. 1. In 3 Inst. 158, it is said that an affray is a public offence to the terror of the King's subjects; and is an English word, and so called because it affrighteth and maketh men afraid; and is inquirable in a leet as a common nuisance.

(c) Reg. v. Hunt, 1 Cox. C. C. 177. Alderson, B. If all the persons present went to see the fight, they were all guilty of an assault; Rex v. Perkins, 4 C. & P. 537. Patteson, J. An assembly for a prize fight is clearly an unlawful assembly, and where there is resistance to lawful authority exercised for the purpose of putting a stop to it, the offence may amount to an affray, or even a riot. (d) 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 65, s. 3.

direct contempt of the justice of the nation, putting men under the necessity of righting themselves. (e) And an affray may receive an aggravation from the persons against whom it is committed; as where the officers of justice are violently disturbed in the due execution of their office, by the rescue of a person legally arrested, or the bare attempt to make such a rescue; the ministers of the law being under its more immediate protection. (f) And further, an affray may receive an aggravation from the place in which it is committed; it is therefore severely punishable when committed in the King's courts, or even in the palace-yard near those courts; and it is highly fineable when made in the presence of any of the King's inferior courts of justice. (g) And, upon the same account also, affrays in a church or church-yard have always been esteemed very heinous offences, as being very great indignities to the Divine Majesty, to whose worship and service such places are immediately dedicated. (h)

It is said, that no quarrelsome or threatening words whatsoever can amount to an affray; and that no one can justify laying his hands on those who shall barely quarrel with angry words, without coming to blows: but it seems that a constable may, at the request of the party threatened, carry the person who threatens to beat him before a justice, in order to find sureties. And granting that no bare words, in the judgment of law, carry in them so much terror as to amount to an affray, yet it seems certain that in some cases there may be an affray where there is no actual violence; as where persons arm themselves with dangerous and unusual weapons, in such a manner as will naturally cause a terror to the people, which is said to have been always an offence at common law, and is strictly prohibited by several statutes. (i)

Words will not make an affray.

But there may be an affray where there is no actual violence, as where persons go armed.

The principal of these statutes is 2 Edw. 3, c. 3, sometimes spoken of as the statute of Northampton. It enacts, that no man, of what condition soever, except the King's servants in his presence, and his ministers in executing their office, and such as be in their company assisting them, and also upon a cry made for arms to keep the peace, shall come before the King's justices or other of the King's ministers doing their office, with force and arms, nor bring any force in affray of peace, (k) nor go nor ride armed, by night or day, in fairs or markets, or in the presence of the King's justices, or other ministers, or elsewhere; upon pain to forfeit their armour to the King, and their bodies to prison at the King's pleasure. The statute also provides, that the King's (k) The words of the statute are en affrai de la pees. But Lord Coke, in 3 Inst. 158, cites it as en affraier de la pais; and observes, that the writ grounded upon the statute says in quorundam de populo terrorem, and that therefore the printed book (en affray de la peuce) should be amended.

justices in their presence, sheriffs, and other ministers in their bailiwicks, lords of franchises and their bailiffs in the same, and mayors and bailiffs of cities and boroughs within the same, and borough-holders, constables, and wardens of the peace within their wards, shall have power to execute the act; and that the judges of assize may inquire and punish such officers as have not done that which pertained to their office. (l)

c. 3, as to per-

In the exposition of the 2 Edw. 3, c. 3, it has been holden, that no wearing of arms is within its meaning, unless it be accompanied with such circumstances as are apt to terrify the people; from whence it seems clearly to follow, that persons of quality are in no danger of offending against the statute by wearing common weapons, or having their usual number of attendants with them for their ornament or defence, in such places, and upon such occasions, in which it is the common fashion to make use of them, without causing the least suspicion of an intention to commit any act of violence, or disturbance of the peace. (m) And no person is within the intention of the statute who arms himself to suppress dangerous rioters, rebels, or enemies, and endeavours to suppress or resist such disturbers of the peace and quiet of the realm. (n) But a man cannot excuse wearing such armour in public by alleging that a person threatened him, and that he wears it for the safety of his person from the assault: though no one will incur the penalty of the statute, for assembling his neighbours and friends in his own house, against those who threaten to do him any violence therein, because a man's house is as his castle. (o)

It may be useful to mention shortly the acts which may be done for the suppression of an affray, by a private person, by a constable, or by a justice of peace.

Of the suppression of affrays by a private person.

It seems to be agreed, that anyone who sees others fighting may lawfully part them, and also stay them till the heat be over, and then deliver them to the constable, who may carry them before a justice of peace, in order to their finding sureties for the peace; and it is said that any private person may stop those whom he shall see coming to join either party. (p) Any person present may arrest the affrayer at the moment of the affray, and detain him till his passion has cooled and his desire to break the peace has ceased, and then deliver him to a peace officer; and so any person may arrest an affrayer after the actual violence is over, but whilst he shows a disposition to renew it by persisting in remaining on the spot where he has committed it. Both cases fall within the same principle, which is that for the sake of the preservation of the peace, any individual who sees it broken, may restrain the remedy by an action against him; and that upon the same ground it seems equally reasonable that if he unavoidably happen to hurt either party, in thus doing what the law both allows and commends, he may well justify it; inasmuch as he is no way in fault, and the damage done to the other was occasioned by a laudable intention to do him a kindness. [294]

liberty of him whom he sees breaking it, so long as his conduct shows that the public peace is likely to be endangered by his acts. In truth, whilst those are assembled together who have committed acts of violence, and the danger of their renewal continues, the affray itself may be said to continue: and during the affray, the constable may, not merely on his own view, but on the information and complaint of another, arrest the offenders, and of course the person so complaining is justified in giving the charge to the constable. The plaintiff went into the defendant's shop, and offered to purchase an article at a price marked on a ticket; the plaintiff disputed with the shopman about the price, and was desired to leave the shop, which he refused to do, and declared he would strike any man who laid hands on him: a shopman then struck him on the face; the plaintiff returned the blow, and a contest commenced, the noise of which brought down the defendant from the room above; when he came down the plaintiff was scuffling with the shopman; the defendant sent for a policeman, and on his arrival the plaintiff was requested by the defendant to go from the shop quietly, but he refused; he was standing still in the shop, insisting on his right to remain there, and a mob gathering round the door, when the defendant gave him in charge to the policeman, who took him to the police station. It was held that the defendant had a right, the danger continuing, to deliver the plaintiff into the hands of the policeman, and that the circumstance that the plaintiff was not guilty of the first illegal violence made no difference; for at the time the defendant interfered he was ignorant of that fact: he saw the plaintiff and others in a mutual contest, and that mutual contest the law gave him power to terminate, for the sake of securing the peace of his house and neighbourhood, and the persons of all those concerned from violence.(g) And it seems to be clear, that if either party be dangerously wounded in such an affray, and a stander by, endeavouring to arrest the other, be not able to take him without hurting or even wounding him, yet he is in no way liable to be punished, inasmuch as he is bound, under pain of fine and imprisonment, to arrest such an offender, and either detain him till it appear whether the party will live or die, or carry him before a justice of peace.(r)

It seems agreed, that a constable is not only empowered, as all private persons are, to part an affray which happens in his presence, but is also bound, at his peril, to use his best endeavours for this purpose:(s) and not only to do his utmost himself, but also to demand the assistance of others, which, if they refuse to give him, they are punishable with fine and imprisonment. In order to support an indictment against a person for refusing to aid and assist a constable in the execution of his duty in quelling a riot, it is necessary to prove: first, that the constable actually saw a breach of the peace committed by two or more persons: secondly, that there was a reasonable necessity for the constable calling upon other persons for their assistance and support; and lastly, that the defendant was duly called upon to render his assistance, and that without any physical impossibility or lawful excuse, he refused to give it; and whether the aid of the defendant, if given, would have proved sufficient or useful, is not the question or criterion. (t) And it is laid down in the books, that if an affray be in a house, the constable may break open the doors to preserve the peace; and if affrayers fly to a house, and he follow with fresh suit, he may break open the doors to take them. (u) And so far is the constable intrusted with a power over all actual affrays, that though he himself is a sufferer by them, and therefore liable to be objected against, as likely to be partial in his own cause, yet he may suppress them; and therefore if an assault be made upon him, he may not only defend himself but also imprison the offender in the same manner as if he were in no way a party. (v) It is said also, that if a constable see persons either actually engaged in an affray, as by striking, or offering to strike, or drawing their weapons, &c., or upon the very point of entering upon an affray, as where one shall threaten to kill, wound, or beat another, he may either carry the offender before a justice of the peace, to the end that such justice may compel him to find sureties for the peace, &c., or he may imprison him of his own authority for a reasonable time till the heat be over, and also afterwards detain him till he find such surety by obligation. But it seems that he has no power to imprison such an offender in any other manner, or for any other purpose; for he cannot justify the committing an affrayer to gaol till he shall be punished for his offence; and it is said that he ought not to lay hands on those who barely contend with hot words, without any threats of personal hurt: and that all which he can do in such a case is to command them, under pain of imprisonment, to avoid fighting. (w)

It has been much doubted whether a private individual, who has seen an affray committed, may give in charge to a constable who has not; and whether such constable may, therefore, take into his custody the affrayers, or either of them, in order to be carried before a justice, after the affray has entirely ceased, after the offenders have quitted the place where it was committed, and there was no danger of renewal; (x) but it seems now to be settled

(w) Id. ibid. sec. 14.

(x) See Timothy v. Simpson, 5 Tyrw. 244. S. C. 1 C. M. & R. 757. The Court did not decide the question. They observed, 'the power of a constable to take into his custody, upon a reasonable information of a private person under such circumstances, and of that person to give in charge, must be correlative. Now as to the authority of a constable, it is perfectly clear that he is not entitled to arrest in order himself to take sureties of the peace, for he cannot administer an oath. Sharrock v. Hannemer, Cro. Eliz. 375, Owen, 105, S. C. nom. Scarrett v. Tanner. But whether he has that power in order to take before a magistrate, that he may take sureties of the peace, is a question on which the authorities differ. Lord Hale seems to have been of opinion that a constable has this power, 2 H. P. C. 89, and the same rule has been laid down at Nisi Prius by Lord Mansfield, in a case referred to in 2 East, 306, and by Buller, J., in two others, one quoted in the same place, and another cited in 3 Campb. N. P. 421. On the other hand, there is a dictum to the contrary in Brooke's Abridgment, tit. Faux Imprisonment, which is referred to and that a constable has no power to arrest a man for an affray done out of his own view, without a warrant from a justice of peace, (y) unless a felony be done, or likely to be done: for it is the proper business of a constable to preserve the peace, not to punish the breach of it; and where a breach of the peace has been committed, and is over, the constable must proceed in the same way as any other person, namely, by obtaining a warrant from a magistrate. (z) It is said that he may carry those before a justice of peace who were arrested by such as were present at an affray, and delivered by them into his hands. (a) Where the plaintiff was imprisoned by a constable in a cell on a false charge of assault, and the defendant, another constable, on hearing the charge from a third constable, without inquiry into the facts, took the plaintiff before the magistrates, it was held that the defendant, in order to justify himself, was bound to show that the charge was well founded, and having failed to do so, was liable to an action of trespass. (b)

There is no doubt but that a justice of peace may and must do all such things for the suppression of an affray, which private men or constables are either enabled or required by the law to do: but it is said that he cannot, without a warrant, authorize the arrest of any person for an affray out of his view. Yet it seems clear, that in such case he may make his warrant to bring the offender before him, in order to compel him to find sureties for the peace. Also it seems that a justice of peace has a greater power over one who has dangerously wounded another in an affray, than either a private person or a constable; for there does not seem to be any good authority, that these have any power to take sureties of such an offender; but it seems certain that a justice of the peace has a discretionary power, either to commit him or to bail him till the year and day be past. It is said, however, that a justice ought to be very cautious how he takes bail, if the wound be dangerous; since, if the party die, and the offender do not appear, the justice is in danger of being severely fined, if upon the whole circumstances of the case he has been too favourable. CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SEVENTH.

OF CHALLENGING TO FIGHT.

It is a very high offence to challenge another, either by word or letter, to fight a duel, or to be the messenger of such a challenge, or even barely to endeavour to provoke another to send a challenge, or to fight; as by dispersing letters, for that purpose, full of reflections, and insinuating a desire to fight. (a) And it will be no excuse for a party so offending, that he has received provocation: for as, if one person should kill another, in a deliberate duel, under the provocation of charges against his character and conduct ever so grievous, it will be murder in him and his second; the bare incitement to fight, though under such provocation, is in itself a very high misdemeanor, though no consequence ensue thereon against the peace. (b) Where, after a prisoner had been convicted, his brother went to the house of the foreman of the jury, and challenged him to mortal combat, it was held that this was a high contempt of the Court before which the trial was held, and punishable as such. (c)

The offence of endeavouring to provoke another to send a challenge to fight was much considered in a modern case, in which it was held to be an indictable misdemeanor: and more especially as such provocation was given in a letter containing libellous matter, and as the prefatory part of the indictment alleged that the defendant intended to do the party bodily harm, and to break the King's peace. (d) And the sending such letter was held to be an act done towards the procuring the commission of the misdemeanor meant to be accomplished. (e) In this case, with respect to the intent of the defendant, the rule was adopted that where an evil intent accompanying an act is necessary to constitute such act a crime, the intent must be alleged in the indictment and proved; though it is sufficient to allege it in the prefatory part of the indictment: but that where the act is in itself unlawful, the law infers an evil intent; and the allegation of such intent is merely matter of form, and need not be proved by extrinsic evidence on the part of the prosecution. Punishment.

It has been considered that mere words of provocation, as 'liar' and 'knave,' though motives and mediate provocation for a breach of the peace, yet do not tend immediately to the breach of the peace, like a challenge to fight, or a threatening to beat another. (g) But words which directly tend to a breach of the peace may be indictable; as if one man challenge another by words; (h) and if it can be proved that the words used were intended to provoke the party to whom they were addressed to give a challenge, the case would seem to fall within the same rule. (i)

In a case where a person wrote a letter with intent to provoke a challenge, sealed it up, and put it into the twopenny post-office in a street in Westminster, addressed to the prosecutor in the city of London, by whom it was there received; Lord Ellenborough, C. J., held that the defendant might be indicted in Middlesex, as there was a sufficient publication in that county by putting the letter into the post-office there, with the intent that it should be delivered to the prosecutor elsewhere; and that if the letter had never been delivered, the defendant's offence would have been the same. (k)

It may be observed, before this subject is concluded, that sending a challenge is an offence for which the Court of King's Bench will grant a criminal information: but in a case where it appeared, upon the affidavits, that the party applying for an information had himself given the first challenge, the Court refused to proceed against the other party by way of information; and left the prosecutor to his ordinary remedy by action or indictment. (l) A rule to show cause why such an information should not be granted has been made, upon producing copies only of the letters in which the challenge was contained, such copies being sufficiently verified. (m)

The punishment for this offence, as a misdemeanor, is discretionary, and must be guided by such circumstances of aggravation or mitigation as are to be found in each particular case. (n) materially to mitigate his offence) was sentenced to pay a fine of £100, and to be imprisoned for one calendar month, and at the expiration of that time to give security to keep the peace for three years, himself in £1,000 and two sureties in £250 each, and to be further imprisoned till such fine was paid and such securities given. Hawkins, speaking of the pernicious consequences of duelling, says, 'upon which considerations persons convicted of barely sending a challenge have been adjudged to pay a fine of £100, and to be imprisoned for one month without bail, and also to make a public acknowledgment of their offence, and to be bound to their good^d behaviour.' 1 Hawk. P. C: c. 63, s. 21.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-EIGHTH.

OF DISTURBANCES IN PLACES OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

It has been already stated that affrays in a church or churchyard have always been esteemed very heinous offences, as being very great indignities to the Divine Majesty, to whose worship and service such places are immediately dedicated; (a) and upon this consideration all irreverent behaviour in these places has been esteemed criminal by the makers of our laws. So that many disturbances occurring in these places are visited with punishment which, if they happened elsewhere, would not be punishable at all; as bare quarrelsome words: and some acts are criminal which would be commendable if done in another place; as arrests by virtue of legal process. (b)

Several statutes have been passed for the purpose of preventing disturbances in places of worship belonging to the established church, and also in those belonging to congregations of Protestant Dissenters and Roman Catholics.

By the 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4, 'if any person whatsoever shall, by words only, quarrel, chide, or brawl, in any church or churchyard, that then it shall be lawful unto the ordinary of the place where the offence shall be done, and proved by two lawful witnesses, to suspend every person so offending; that is to say, if he be a layman, ab ingressu ecclesiæ, and if he be a clerk, from the ministration of his office, for so long time as the said ordinary shall by his discretion think meet and convenient, according to the fault.' (c)

chiding, or brawling in a church or churchyard.

By sec. 2, 'if any person or persons shall smite or lay violent hands upon any other, either in any church or churchyard, then ipso facto every person so offending shall be deemed excommunicate, and be excluded from the fellowship and company of Christ's congregation.' (d)

Smiting, or laying violent hands in a church or
churchyard,

In the construction of this statute it has been held that the Ecclesiastical Court may proceed upon the two first sections, and is not to be prohibited; for though the offence mentioned in the second section of smiting in the church or churchyard is still an offence at common law, and the offender may be indicted for it,

Construction of the statute.

(c) By the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 1, 'it shall not be lawful for any ecclesiastical court in England or Ireland to entertain or adjudicate upon any suit or cause of brawling commenced after July 3, 1860, against any person not being in holy orders;' and by sec. 4, the 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4 is repealed 'so far as relates to persons not in holy orders.'

(d) The 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, repeals this Act as far 'as relates to the punishment of persons convicted of striking with any weapon, or drawing any weapon with intent to strike as therein mentioned.' The statute has three degrees of offences, per Lord Mansfield, C. J., 1 Burr. 242, and only the last, i.e., sec. 3, seems to be repealed. C. S. G.

yet, besides this, he may, by the act, be ipso facto excommunicated. (e) No previous conviction is necessary in this case; though, if there be one, the ordinary may use it as proof of the fact. But if the Ecclesiastical Court proceeds for damages on either clause, the Court of King's Bench will prohibit them; for the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Court are pro salute animæ. (f)

Cathedral churches, and the churchyards which belong to them, are within the statute. (g) And it will be no excuse for a person who strikes another in a church, &c., to show that the other assaulted him. (h) But churchwardens, or perhaps private persons, who whip boys for playing in the church, or pull off the hats of those who obstinately refuse to take them off themselves, or gently lay their hands on those who disturb the performance of any part of divine service, and turn them out of the church, are not within the meaning of the statute. (i)

during the time of divine service.

By the 1 Mary, sess. 2, c. 3, s. 2, 'if any person or persons, of their own power and authority, do and shall willingly and of purpose, by open and overt word, fact, act, or deed, maliciously or contemptuously molest, let, disturb, vex, or trouble, or by any other unlawful ways or means disquiet or misuse, any preacher or preachers, licensed, allowed, or authorized, to preach by the Queen's Highness, or by any archbishop or bishop of this realm, or by any other lawful ordinary, or by any of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, or otherwise lawfully authorized or charged by reason of his or their cure, benefice or other spiritual promotion or charge, in any of his or their open sermon, preaching, or collation, that he or they shall make, declare, preach or pronounce, in any church, chapel, churchyard, or in any other place or places, used, frequented, or appointed, or that hereafter shall be used or appointed to be preached in; or if any person or persons shall maliciously, willingly, or of purpose, molest, let, disturb, vex, disquiet, or otherwise trouble, any parson, vicar, parish priest, or curate, or any lawful priest, preparing, saying, doing, singing, ministering or celebrating the mass, or other such divine service, sacraments or sacramentals, as was most commonly frequented and used in the last year of the reign of the late sovereign lord King Henry the Eighth, or that at any time hereafter shall be allowed, set forth, or authorized, by the Queen's Majesty; or, if any person or persons shall unlawfully, contemptuously, or maliciously, of their own power or authority, pull down, deface, spoil, or otherwise break, any altar or altars, or any crucifix or cross, in any church, chapel, or churchyard, every such offender, his aiders, procurers, or abettors, may be apprehended by any constable or churchwarden of the place where such offence shall be committed, or by any other officer or person then being present at the time of the said offence, and being so apprehended, shall be brought before some justice of the peace, by whom he shall, upon due accusation, be committed forthwith; and within six days next after the accusation the said justice, with one other justice, shall diligently examine the offence; and if the two justices find the person guilty, by proof of two witnesses, or confession, they shall commit him to gaol for three months, and further to the quarter sessions next after the end of the three months; at which sessions he is upon repentance to be discharged, finding surety for his good behaviour for a year; and if he will not repent, he is to be further committed till he does. (k)

The disturbance of a minister in saying the present common prayer is within this statute; for the express mention of such divine service as should be afterwards authorized by Queen Mary impliedly includes such service also as should be authorized by her successors, upon the principle that as the King never dies, a prerogative given generally to one goes of course to others. (l)

The 1 Mary, sess. 2, c. 3, merely gave to the common law cognizance of an offence, which was before punishable by the ecclesiastical law; and in order to be within that statute, the party must maliciously, wilfully, or of purpose, molest the person celebrating divine service. The plaintiff on a Sunday presented a notice to the parish clerk, and desired him to read it. The clerk, after consulting the minister, refused to do so. After the Nicene Creed had been read, and whilst the minister was walking from the communion table to the vestry-room, and whilst no part of the service was actually going on, the plaintiff stood up in his pew and read a notice that a vestry would be held to choose churchwardens, whereupon the minister desired a constable to take him out of the church, which the constable did, and detained him an hour after the service was over, and then allowed him to go upon promising to attend before a magistrate the next day. It was held, that although the constable might be justified in removing him from the church, and detaining him until the service was over, he could not detain him afterwards to take him before a magistrate under this statute. Abbott, C. J., said, 'had the notice been read by the plaintiff whilst any part of the service was actually going on, we might have thought that he had done it on purpose to molest the minister; but the act having been done during an interval when no part of the service was in the course of being performed, and the party apparently supposing that he had a right to give such a notice, I am not prepared to say that the 1 Mary, sess. 2, c. 3, warranted his detention in order that he might be taken before a justice.' (m)

The statute further provides, that persons rescuing offenders so apprehended as aforesaid, or hindering the arrest of offenders, shall suffer like imprisonment, and pay a fine of five pounds for each offence. (n) And if any offenders be not apprehended, but escape, the escape is to be presented at the quarter sessions, and the inhabitants of the parish where the escape was suffered are to forfeit five pounds. been doubted whether such an indictment is sustainable, as being for a mere trespass. (q)

Obstructing or assaulting a clergyman or other minister in the discharge of his duties.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 36, 'Whosoever shall, by threats or force, obstruct or prevent, or endeavour to obstruct or prevent, any clergyman or other minister in or from celebrating divine service or otherwise officiating in any church, chapel, meeting house, or other place of divine worship, or in or from the performance of his duty in the lawful burial of the dead in any churchyard or other burial place, or shall strike or offer any violence to, or shall, upon any civil process, or under the pretence of executing any civil process, arrest any clergyman or other minister who is engaged in, or to the knowledge of the offender is about to engage in, any of the rites or duties in this section aforesaid, or who to the knowledge of the offender shall be going to perform the same or returning from the performance thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' (r)

The 1 Will. & M. c. 18, s. 18, which was passed for the purpose of exempting Protestants dissenting from the Church of England from the penalties of certain laws therein mentioned, enacts, 'that if any person or persons shall, willingly and of purpose, maliciously or contemptuously, come into any cathedral or parish church, chapel, or other congregation permitted by this Act, and disquiet or disturb the same, or misuse any preacher or teacher; such person or persons, upon proof thereof before any justice of peace, by two or more sufficient witnesses, shall find two sureties to be bound by recognizance in the penal sum of fifty pounds; and in default of such sureties shall be committed to prison, there to remain till the next general or quarter sessions; and upon conviction of the said offence at the said general or quarter sessions, shall suffer the pain and penalty of twenty pounds,' to the use of the King.

Before this statute the Court of King's Bench refused to grant a certiorari to remove an indictment at the sessions against a person not behaving himself modestly and reverently at the church during divine service; for, although the offence was punishable by ecclesiastical censures, the Court considered it properly to come within the cognizance of the justices of the peace. (s) An indictment upon the statute, found at the quarter sessions, may be removed by certiorari before verdict, notwithstanding the words of the statute, which seem at the first view to confine the cognizance of the offence

(r) This clause is new in England, except that part which applies to the arrest of any clergyman while performing divine service, or going to perform the same, or returning from the performance thereof, which was contained in both the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 23, and 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 27 (1.). The rest of the clause is framed on the Irish Acts of the 27 Geo. 3, c. 15, s. 5; 40 Geo. 3, c. 96, s. 5; 5 Geo. 4, c. 25, s. 5; and 5 Vict. sess. 2, c. 28, ss. 7, 19. The amendments consist in including ministers not of the Church of England and Ireland, and all places of divine worship, and all burial places, and in adding the endeavour to prevent or obstruct, the offering any violence to, and the arrest under pretence of executing any civil process of, any clergyman or minister engaged in or about to engage in any of the rites or duties mentioned in this clause. to the justices in the first instance, and in the next to the quarter sessions. (t)

The oaths taken by a preacher under this Act are matter of record, and cannot be proved by parol evidence: but it is not necessary, upon an indictment for disturbing a dissenting congregation, to prove that the minister has taken the oaths. (u) It is no defence to such an indictment that the defendant committed the outrage for the purpose of asserting his right to the situation of clerk. (v) And it has been held that a congregation of foreign Lutherans, conducting the service of their chapel in the German language, are within the protection of the statute. (w) Upon the conviction of several defendants, each of them is liable to a penalty of twenty pounds. (x)

Points decided upon this statute.

The 1 Will. & M. c. 18, only applies where the thing is done wilfully, and of purpose to disturb the congregation or misuse the minister. (y)

By the 52 Geo. 3, c. 155, s. 12, 'If any person or persons do and shall wilfully and maliciously or contemptuously disquiet or disturb any meeting, assembly, or congregation of persons assembled for religious worship, permitted or authorized by this Act, or any former Act or Acts of Parliament, or shall in any way disturb, molest, or misuse any preacher, teacher, or person officiating at such meeting, assembly, or congregation, or any person or persons there assembled; such person or persons so offending, upon proof thereof before any justice of the peace by two or more credible witnesses, shall find two sureties to be bound by recognizances in the penal sum of fifty pounds to answer for such offence; and in default of such sureties shall be committed to prison, there to remain till the next general or quarter sessions; and upon conviction of the said offence at the said general or quarter sessions shall suffer the pain and penalty of forty pounds.' By sec. 14 nothing contained in the Act shall extend to Quakers, nor to any meetings or assemblies for religious worship held or convened by them.

It has been holden upon this statute, in conformity to the decision which has been mentioned upon the 1 Will. & M. c. 18, (z) that an indictment found at the quarter sessions may be removed into the Court of King's Bench by certiorari before trial, (a) and may be tried at the assizes.

Certiorari.

A similar provision to that contained in the 1 Will. & M. c. 18, s. 18, (b) relating to Protestant dissenters, is enacted in the 31 Geo. 3, c. 32, s. 10, with respect to Roman Catholic congregations, or assemblies of religious worship permitted by the latter statute.

Disturbing Roman Catholic congregations.

The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 86, recites the 1 Will. & M. sess. 1, c. 18, and 52 Geo. 3, c. 155, and enacts that nothing contained in these Acts or in the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 36, shall apply, (1), to any congregation or assembly for religious worship held in any parish or ecclesiastical district, and conducted by the incumbent, or in case the incumbent is not resident, by the curate of such parish or

And no person permitting any such congregation to meet as herein-mentioned in any place occupied by him shall be liable to any penalty for so doing. (c)

in churches,
&c.

The 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2, renders liable to summary conviction any person guilty of riotous, violent or indecent behaviour in any church or chapel of the Church of England and Ireland, or in any chapel of any religious denomination, or in any place of religious worship certified under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81, whether during the celebration of divine service or at any other time, or in any churchyard or burial ground, or who molests, disturbs, &c., any preacher or clergyman as therein mentioned.

Conspiracies
or riots.

The facts attending disturbances of religious assemblies may sometimes authorize proceedings at common law for a conspiracy or a riot : (d) and we have seen that by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 11, if persons riotously assembled begin to demolish or pull down any church or chapel, or any chapel for the religious worship of persons dissenting from the worship of the united church of England and Ireland, they will be guilty of felony. dissenters are subject after the passing of this Act. See the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81, as to registering places of religious worship.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-NINTH.

OF FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER.

A FORCIBLE entry or detainer is committed by violently taking or keeping possession of lands and tenements with menaces, force, and arms, and without the authority of the law. (a) It has been laid down in the books that, at common law, and before the passing of the statutes relating to this subject, if a man had a right of entry upon lands or tenements, he was permitted to enter with force and arms; and to detain his possession by force, where his entry was lawful: (b) and that even at this day he who is wrongfully dispossessed of his goods, may justify the retaking of them by force from the wrong-doer, if he refuse to redeliver them. (c) However, it is clear that, in many cases, an indictment will lie at common law for a forcible entry, if it contain, not merely the common technical words, 'with force and arms,' but also such a statement as shows that the facts charged amount to more than a bare trespass, for which no one can be indicted. (d) And in a modern case in the Court of King's Bench, it was mentioned, by the great judge who then presided in that Court, as a part of the law which ought to be preserved, that no one shall with force and violence assert his own title. (e) But on a subsequent day of the same term he said that the Court wished that the grounds of their opinion in that case might be understood, and desired that it might not be considered as a precedent in other cases to which it did not apply. He then proceeded: 'Perhaps some doubt may hereafter arise respecting what Mr. Serjeant Hawkins says, that at common law the party may enter with force into that to which he has a legal title. But without giving any opinion concerning that dictum one way or the other, but leaving it to be proved or disproved whenever that question shall arise, all that we wish to say is, that our opinion in this case leaves that question untouched: it appearing by this indictment that the defendants unlawfully entered, and therefore the Court cannot intend that they had any title. (f) There seems now to be no doubt that a party may be guilty of a forcible entry by violently, and with force, entering into that to which he has a legal title, (g) But where a breach of the peace is committed by a freeholder, who, in order to get into possession of his land, assaults a person wrongfully holding possession of it against his will, although the freeholder may be responsible to the public in the shape of an indictment for a forcible entry, he is not liable to the person wrongfully holding possession. (h)

statutes.

Whatever may be the true doctrine upon this subject at common law, the statutes which have been passed respecting forcible entries and detainers are clearly intended to restrain all persons from having recourse to violent methods of doing themselves justice: and it is the more usual and effectual method to proceed upon these statutes, which give restitution and damages to the party grieved.

None shall enter into lands, &c., with strong

By the 5 Rich. 2, c. 8, 'none shall make entry into any lands and tenements, but in case where entry is given by the law; and in such case not with strong hand, nor with multitude of people, but only in a peaceable and easy manner,' on pain of imprisonment and ransom. This statute gave no speedy remedy, leaving the party injured to the common course of proceeding by indictment or action; and made no provision at all against forcible detainers. The 15 Rich. 2, c. 2, goes further, and enacts, that on complaint of forcible entry into lands and tenements, or other possessions whatsoever, 'to the justices of peace or any of them, the same justices or justice take sufficient power of the county, and go to the place where the force is made; and if they find any that hold such place forcibly after such entry made, they shall be taken and put in the next gaol, there to abide convict by the record of the same justices or justice,' until they make fine and ransom: and that the people of the county and the sheriff shall assist, &c., on pain of imprisonment and fine. 'And in the same manner it shall be done of them that make such forcible entries in benefices or offices of holy church.' But this statute gave no remedy against those who were guilty of a forcible detainer after a peaceable entry, nor against those who were guilty of both a forcible entry and forcible detainer, if they were removed before the coming of a justice of peace; and it gave no power to the justice to restore the party

(g) In Newton v. Harland, 1 M. & Gr. 644, the judges of the Court of Common Pleas seem to have been of opinion that a landlord who entered forcibly into the house of a tenant after the expiration of his term, would be guilty of a forcible entry, both at common law and under the statutes; and the only doubt was whether, supposing there was such a forcible entry upon a tenant after the expiration of the term, the possession thereby obtained was legal. Tindal, C. J., Bosanquet and Erskine, JJ., holding that if the landlord, in making his entry upon the tenant, had been guilty of a breach of a positive statute, or of an offence against the common law, that such violation of the law in making the entry caused the possession thereby gained to be illegal. Coltman, J., holding that although the defendant, if guilty of a forcible entry, was responsible for it in the way of a criminal prosecution, yet that, as against the tenants, who are wrong-doers, and altogether without title, he had obtained by his entry a lawful possession, and might justify in a civil action removing them, in like manner as in the case of any other trespasser. Parke and Alderson, BB., who had each tried the case, were of the same opinion as Coltman, J., and still retain it. Harvey v. Bridges, 14 M. & W. 437. 1 Exch. R. 261. See Butcher v. Butcher, 7 B. & C. 399. 1 M. & R. 220. Hillary v. Gay, 6 C. & P. 284. Davison v. Wilson, 11 Q. B. 890. Burling v. Read, 11 Q. injured to his possession, and did not impose any penalty on the sheriff for disobeying the precepts of the justices in the execution of the statute. Further enactments were therefore necessary. (i)

By the 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, s. 3, though the persons making forcible entries 'be present or else departed before the coming of the justices or justice, the same justices or justice, in some good town next to the tenements so entered, or in some other convenient place, according to their discretion, shall have or either of them shall have authority to inquire, by the people of the same county, as well of them that make such forcible entries in lands and tenements as of them which the same hold with force; and if it be found before any of them that any doth contrary to this statute, then the said justices or justice shall cause to re-seise the lands and tenements so entered or holden as afore, and shall put the party put out in full possession as before.' And after making provision concerning the precepts of the justices to the sheriff to return a jury to inquire of forcible entries, the qualification of the jurors, and the remedy by action against those who obtain forcible possession of lands, &c., sec. 6 enacts, that mayors, &c., of cities, towns, and boroughs, having franchise, shall have in such cities, &c., like power to remove such entries, and in other articles aforesaid, rising within the same, as the justices of peace and sheriffs in counties. Sec. 7 provides, that 'they which keep their possessions with force in any lands or tenements, whereof they or their ancestors, or they whose estates they have in such lands and tenements, have continued their possessions in the same by three years or more, be not endamaged by force of this statute.' And by the 31 Eliz. c. 11, 'no restitution, upon any indictment of forcible entry, or holding with force, be made to any person or persons, if the person or persons so indicted hath had the occupation, or hath been in quiet possession by the space of three whole years together next before the day of such indictment so found, and his, her, or their estate or estates therein not ended or determined; which the party indicted shall and may allege for stay of restitution, and restitution to stay until that be tried, if the other will deny or traverse the same: and if the same allegation be tried against the same person or persons so indicted, then the same person or persons so indicted to pay such costs and damages to the other party as shall be assessed by the judges or justices before whom the same shall be tried; the same costs and damages to be recovered and levied as is usual for costs and damages contained in judgments upon other actions.'

The 15 Rich. 2, c. 2, gave magistrates a summary jurisdiction in all cases of forcible entry; but in cases of forcible detainer, only where there had been a previous forcible entry; notwithstanding that statute, a party who had acquired the possession of lands peaceably but unlawfully, might afterwards detain them forcibly; that was a mischief the 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, was intended to remedy; and it gives justices summary jurisdiction only in cases of forcible detainer, preceded by an unlawful entry, and therefore a conviction by justices on that statute merely stating an entry and a forcible detainer is insufficient. (k)

Doubt upon the statutes whether lessee for years or copyholder ousted by the lessor or lord could have restitution.

Removed by 21 Jac. 1, c. 15.

In the construction of these statutes it has been holden, that if a lessee for years or a copyholder be ousted, and the lessor or lord disseised, and such ouster, as well as disseisin, be found in an indictment of forcible entry, the Court may, in their discretion, award a restitution of the possession to such lessee or copyholder; which was, by necessary consequence, a re-seisin of the freehold also, whether the lessor or lord had desired or opposed it. But it was a great question, whether a lessee for years or a copyholder, being ousted by the lessor or lord, could have a restitution of their possession within the equity of 8 Hen. 6, the words of which are, that the justice 'shall cause to re-seise the lands,' &c., and by which it seems to be implied that the party must be ousted of such an estate whereof he may be said to be seised, which must at least be a freehold. For the purpose of removing this doubt, it was enacted by 21 Jac. 1, c. 15, that such judges, justices, or justice of the peace as by reason of any Act of Parliament then in force were authorized to give restitution to tenants of any estate of freehold of their lands, &c., entered upon by force, or withheld by force, shall have the like authority (upon indictment of such forcible entries or forcible withholdings) to give like restitution of possession to 'tenants for terms of years, tenants by copy of court roll, guardians by knight's service, tenants by elegit, statute merchant and staple.' It has been holden, that a tenant by the verge is not within this statute: but the propriety of this decision is doubted; as such person, having no other evidence of his title but by the copy of court roll, seems at least to be within the meaning, if not within the words, of the statute. (l)

If a lessor eject his lessee for years, and afterwards be forcibly put out of possession again by such lessee, he has no remedy for a restitution by force of any of the above-mentioned statutes: there seems, however, to be no doubt but that a justice of peace, &c., may remove the force, and commit the offender. (m)

Construction.

The law upon these statutes respecting forcible entries and detainers may be further considered with reference — I. To the persons who may commit the offence. II. To the nature of the possessions in respect of which it may be committed. III. To the acts which will amount to a forcible entry. And, IV. To the acts which amount to a forcible detainer.

As to the persons who may commit the offence.

I. A man who breaks open the doors of his own dwelling-house, or of a castle, which is his own inheritance, but forcibly detained from him by one who claims the bare custody of it, cannot be guilty of a forcible entry or detainer within these statutes. (n) Where a wife was indicted with others for a forcible entry into a house, which she had taken for herself, but of which her husband had afterwards obtained possession with the landlord's consent, and it was objected that a wife could not be guilty of a forcible entry into the house of her husband; Lord Tenterden, C. J., said, 'although a wife certainly cannot commit a trespass on the property of her husband, I am by no means satisfied that, if she comes with strong hand, she may not be indictable for a forcible entry, which proceeds on the breach of the public peace.' 'As at present advised I think she may be guilty of a forcible entry, if her entry was made under circumstances of violence amounting to a breach of the public peace.' (o) But a joint tenant or tenant in common may offend against the statutes either by forcibly ejecting or forcibly holding out his companion; for though the entry of such a tenant be lawful per my et per tout, so that he cannot in any case be punished in an action of trespass at common law, yet the lawfulness of his entry does not excuse the violence, or lessen the injury, done to his companion; and, consequently, an indictment of forcible entry into a moiety of a manor, &c., is good. (p) Also where a man has been in possession of land for a great length of time by a defeasible title, and a claim is made by him who has a right of entry, the wrongful possessor, continuing his occupation, will be punishable for a forcible entry and detainer; because all his estate was defeated by the claim, and his continuance in possession afterwards amounts in the judgment of law to a new entry. (q) It does not follow from the decision in Rex v. Oakley (r) that the 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, does not apply to the case of a tenant at will or for years, holding over after the will is determined or term expired, because the continuance afterwards may amount in judgment of law to a new entry. (s)

R. 431. Turner v. Meymot, 1 Bing. 158, and Newton v. Harland, ante, p. 422, note (g), which seem to show that the position in the text is erroneous. C. S. G.

II. A person may be guilty of this offence by a force done to ecclesiastical possessions, as churches, vicarage houses, &c., as much as if it were done to a temporal inheritance. And it has been holden, as a general rule, that a person may be indicted for a forcible entry into any such incorporeal hereditament for which a writ of entry will lie, either by the common law, as for rent, or by statute as for tithes, &c. It is, however, questioned whether there be any good authority that such an indictment will lie for a common or office; though it seems agreed that an indictment of forcible detainer lies against any one, whether he be the terretenant or a stranger, who shall forcibly disturb the lawful proprietor in the enjoyment of these possessions; as by violently resisting a lord in his distress for a rent, or by menacing a commoner with bodily hurt, if he dare put in his beasts into the common, &c. No one can come within the danger of these statutes by a violence offered to another in respect of a way, or such like easement which is no possession. But it seems that a man cannot be convicted, upon view, by force of the 15 Rich. 2, c. 2, of a forcible detainer of any incorporeal inheritance wherein he cannot be said to have made a precedent forcible entry. Abbr. tit. Forcible Entry, §c. (C.)

As to the acts which will amount to a forcible entry.

Forcible entry from circumstances of terror.

III. A forcible entry must regularly be with a strong hand, with unusual weapons, or with menace of life or limb: it must be accompanied with some circumstances of actual violence or terror; and an entry which has no other force than such as is implied by the law in every trespass is not within these statutes. (u) An entry may be forcible not only in respect of a violence actually done to the person of a man, as by beating him if he refuse to relinquish his possession; but also in respect of any other kind of violence in the manner of the entry, as by breaking open the doors of a house, whether any person be in it at the time or not, especially if it be a dwelling-house, and perhaps also by any act of outrage after the entry, as by carrying away the party's goods, &c., which being found in an assize of novel disseisin, will make the defendant a disseisor with force, and subject him to fine and imprisonment. (v) If a man enters to distrain for rent in arrear with force, this is a forcible entry, because, though he does not claim the land itself, yet he claims a right and title out of it, which by these statutes he is forbid to exert by force; but if a man who has a rent be resisted from his distress with force, this is a forcible disseisin of the rent, for which he may recover treble damages in an assize, or may fine and imprison the party: but he cannot have a writ of restitution; for the statute does not give the justices power to reaise the rent, but only the lands and tenements themselves. (w) If one find a man out of his house, and forcibly withhold him from returning to it, and send persons to take peaceable possession of it in the party's absence, this according to the better opinion is a forcible entry. (x) And there may be a forcible entry where any person's wife, children, or servants, are upon the lands to preserve the possession: because whatever a man does by his agents is his own act: but his cattle being upon the ground do not preserve his possession, because they are not capable of being substituted as agents; and, therefore, their being upon the land continues no possession. (y)

Whenever a man, either by his behaviour or speech, at the time of his entry, gives those who are in possession of the tenements which he claims just cause to fear that he will do them some bodily hurt, if they will not give way to him, his entry is esteemed forcible; whether he cause such a terror by carrying with him an unusual number of servants, or by arming himself in such a manner as plainly intimates a design to back his pretensions by force, or by actually threatening to kill, maim, or beat those who shall continue in possession, or by giving out such speeches as plainly imply a purpose of using force against those who shall make any resistance. (z) And there is no necessity that anyone should be assaulted; for if the entry be with such number of persons and show of force as is calculated to deter the rightful owner from sending them away, and resuming his own possession, that is sufficient. (a) But a forcible entry is not proved by evidence of a mere trespass, there must be proof of such force, or at least such a show of force, as is calculated to prevent any resistance. (b) And though a man enter peaceably, yet if he turn the party out of possession by force, or frighten him out of possession by threats, it is a forcible entry. (c) But threatening to spoil the party's goods, or destroy his cattle, or to do him any similar damage, which is not personal, if he will not quit the possession, seems not to amount to a forcible entry. (d)

If a person who pretends a title to lands merely go over them, either with or without a great number of attendants, armed or unarmed, in his way to the church, or market, or for a like purpose, without doing any act which either expressly or impliedly amounts to a claim of the lands, he cannot be considered as making an entry within the meaning of the statutes: otherwise, if he make an actual claim with any circumstances of force or terror. (e) Drawing a latch and entering a house seems not to be a forcible entry according to the better opinion: (f) so if a man open the door with a key, or enter by an open window, or if the entry be without the semblance of force, as by coming in peaceably, enticing the owner out of possession, and afterwards excluding him by shutting the door, without other force, these will not be forcible entries. (g)

A single person may commit a forcible entry as well as a number. (h) But all who accompany a man when he makes a forcible entry will be deemed to enter with him, whether they actually come upon the lands or not. (i) So, if several come in company where their entry is not lawful, and all of them, except one, enter in a peaceable manner, and that one only use force, it is a forcible entry in them all, because they come in company to do an unlawful act; but it is otherwise where one had a right of entry, for there they only come to do a lawful act, and therefore it is the force of him only who used it. (k) And he who barely agrees to a forcible entry made to his use, without his knowledge or privity, is not within the statutes, because he did not concur in or promote the force. (l)

IV. Forcible detainer is where a man, who enters peaceably, afterwards detains his possession by force: and the same circumstances of violence or terror which will make an entry forcible, will also make a detainer forcible. From whence it seems to follow that whoever keeps in his house an unusual number of people, or unusual weapons, or threatens to do some bodily hurt to the former possessor, if he dare return, is guilty of a forcible detainer, though no attempt be made to re-enter: and it has been said that he also will come under the like construction who places men at a distance from the house in order to assault anyone who shall attempt to make an entry into it; and that he is in like manner guilty who shuts his doors against a justice of peace coming to view the force, and obstinately refuses to let him come in. (m) This doctrine will apply to a lessee who, after the end of his term, keeps arms in his house to oppose the entry of the lessor, though no one attempt an entry; or to a lessee at will detaining with force after the will is determined: (n) and it will apply in like manner to a detaining with force by a mortgagor after the mortgage is forfeited, or to the feoffee of a disseisor after entry or claim by the disseisee. And a lessee resisting with force a distress for rent, or forestalling or rescuing the distress, will also be guilty of this offence. (o)

Circumstances which do not amount to a forcible detainer.

But a man will not be guilty of the offence of forcible detainer for merely refusing to go out of a house, and continuing therein in despite of another. (p) So that it is not a forcible detainer if a lessee at will, after the determination of the will, denies possession to the lessor when he demands it; or shuts the door against the lessor when he would enter; or if he keeps out a commoner, by force, upon his own land. (q) And it has been seen that the 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, does not apply to a person who has been in possession for three years by himself, or any other under whom he claims. (r) But a person in quiet possession for three years, and then disseised by force, and restored, cannot afterwards detain with force within three years after his restitution; for his possession was interrupted. (s)

Remedies.

The remedies against such as are guilty of forcible entries or detainers are either by action, by complaint to justices of the peace (who may proceed upon view or inquisition), or by indictment at the general sessions. (t) And if a forcible entry or detainer be made by three persons or more, it is also a riot; and may be proceeded against as such, if no inquiry has before been made of the force. (u) Some of the points which have been determined with respect to an indictment for these offences, and also concerning the award of restitution, may be shortly noticed. (v)

Of the indictment. Statement of force and violence.

The statutes seem to require that the entry should be laid in the indictment manu forti, or cum multitudine gentium: but some have holden that equivalent words will be sufficient, especially if the indictment concludes contra formam statuti; but it is not sufficient to say only that the party entered vi et armis, since that is the common allegation in every trespass. (w) No particular technical words are necessary in an indictment at common law; all that is required is, that it should appear by the indictment that such force and violence have been used as constitute a public breach of the peace. (x)

The tenement in which the force was committed must be described with convenient certainty; for otherwise the defendant will not know the particular charge to which he is to make his defence, nor will the justices or sheriff know how to restore the injured party to his possession. Thus an indictment of forcible entry into a tenement, (y) which may signify anything whatsoever wherein a man may have an estate of freehold, (z) or into a house or tenement, (a) or into two closes of meadow or pasture, (b) or into a rood or half a rood of land, (c) or into certain lands belonging to such a house, (d) or into such a house without showing in what town it lies, (e) or into a tenement, with the appurtenances, called Truepenny in D., (f) is not good. But an indictment for a forcible entry in domum mansionalem sive messuagium, &c., is good, for these are words equipollent. (g) And an indictment for an entry into a close called Serjeant Herne's close, without adding the number of acres, is good; for here is as much certainty as is required in ejectment. (h) And an indictment may be void as to such part of it only as is uncertain, and good for so much as is certain: thus an indictment for a forcible entry into a house and certain acres of land may be quashed as to the land, and stand good as to the house. (i) Upon an indictment against a wife for a forcible entry into a house, which she had originally taken in her own name, but into which her husband had afterwards entered for the purpose of giving up possession to the owner, the house is well described as the house of the husband. (k)

Description of the premises.

An indictment on the 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, (l) must show that the place was the freehold of the party grieved at the time of the force. (m) And in a case where the Court quashed an indictment, because it did not appear what estate the person expelled had in the premises, they said that it was absolutely necessary that this should appear, otherwise it would be uncertain whether any one of the statutes relative to forcible entries extended to the estate from which the expulsion was: the 5 Rich. 2, c. 7, the 15 Rich. 2, c. 2, and the 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, only extending to freehold estates; and the 21 Jac. 1, c. 15, extending only to estates holden by tenants for years, tenants by copy of court-roll, and tenants by elegit, statute merchant, and statute staple. (n) And it has been laid down as a general rule that an indictment cannot warrant a restitution, unless it find that the party was seised at the time. (o) So also an inquisition under the 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, will not warrant a justice in restoring possession, unless it set forth the estate possessed by the party in the property. (p) But an indictment which charges that the defendants forcibly entered into a messuage of one W. P., he the said W. P., then and there being seised thereof, sufficiently avers the present seisin of W. P. to warrant the Court in awarding restitution. (q) But in an indictment at common law, where the breach of the public peace is the gist of the offence, and the prosecutor is not entitled to restitution and damages, it appears to be sufficient to state only that the prosecutor was in possession of the premises. (r)

statement of disseisin, &c.

A repugnancy in setting forth the offence in an indictment on these statutes is an incurable fault: as where it is alleged that the party was possessed of a term of years, or of a copyhold estate, and that the defendants disseised him; or that the defendants disseised J. S. of land then and yet being his freehold, for it implies that he always continued in possession; and if so, it is impossible he could be disseised at all. (s) It seems that an indictment on 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, setting forth an entry and forcible detainer is good, without showing whether the entry was forcible or peaceable: but it must set forth an entry; for otherwise it does not appear but that the party has been always in possession, in which case he may lawfully detain it by force. (t) The time and place of the disseisin must be sufficiently set forth in the indictment: but it appears to be sufficient to state, that the defendant on such a day entered, &c., and disseised, &c., without adding the words then and there; for it is the natural intendment that the entry and disseisin both happened together. (u) A disseisin is sufficiently set forth by alleging that the defendant entered, &c., into such a tenement, and disseised the party, without using the words 'unlawfully,' or 'expelled,' for they are implied. (v) But no indictment can warrant an award of restitution, unless it find that the wrong-doer ousted the party grieved, and also continues his possession at the time of the finding of the indictment; for it is a repugnancy to award restitution of possession to one who never was in possession, and it is in vain to award it to one who does not appear to have lost it. (w)

If a bill, both for a forcible entry and forcible detainer, be preferred to a grand jury, and found 'not a true bill' as to the entry with force, and 'a true bill' as to the detainer, it will not warrant an award of restitution; but is void, because the grand jury cannot find a bill, true for part, and false for part, as a petit jury may. Upon an indictment on the 21 Jac. 1, c. 15, or 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, Evidence. whereby restitution of the possession of lands entered upon by force, or holden by force, may be awarded to the respective tenants thereof; the tenant whose land has been entered upon, or withheld by force, is now a competent witness for the prosecution by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99. (y)

On an indictment at common law, the prosecutor need only prove a peaceable possession at the time of the ouster. (z) On an indictment upon the statutes a seisin in fee or the existence of a term or other tenancy must be shown; (a) but proof that the prosecutor holds colourably as a freeholder or leaseholder will suffice; and the Court will not, on the trial, enter into the validity of an adverse claim made by the defendant, which he ought to assert, not by force, but by action. (b)

The same justice or justices before whom an indictment of forcible entry or detainer shall be found may award restitution: but no other justices, except those before whom the inquest was found, can award restitution, unless the indictment be removed by certiorari into the Court of King's Bench; and that Court, by the plenitude of its power, can restore, because that is supposed to be implied by the statute; on the ground that whenever an inferior jurisdiction is erected, the superior jurisdiction must have authority to put it in execution. So, if an indictment be found before the justices of the peace at their quarter sessions, they have authority to award a writ of restitution, because the statute having given power to the justices or justice to reseise, it may as well be done by them in Court as out of it. (c) But the justices of oyer and terminer, or general gaol delivery, though they may inquire of forcible entries, and fine the parties, yet cannot award a writ of restitution. (d)

Restitution ought only to be awarded for the possession of tenements visible and corporeal; for a man who has a right to such as are invisible and incorporeal, as rents or commons, cannot be put out of possession of them, but only at his own election, by a fiction of law, to enable him to recover damages against the person that disturbs him in the enjoyment of them; and all the remedy that can be desired against a force in respect to such possessions is to have the force removed, and those who are guilty of it punished,

C. c. 64, s. 51, where it is said that justices of oyer and terminer have no power either to inquire of a forcible entry or detainer, or to award restitution on an indictment on the statutes; because when a new power is created by statute, and certain justices are assigned to execute it, it cannot regularly be executed by any other; and inasmuch as justices of oyer and terminer have a commission entirely distinct from that of justices of peace, they shall not from the general words of their commission ad inquirend' de omnibus, &c., be construed to have any such powers as are specially limited to justices of peace. But in Com. Dig. tit. Forc. Entr. (D. 5), it is said that justices of gaol delivery may award restitution upon an indictment before them: and Sav. 78, is cited: and afterwards id. (D. 7), it is said that restitution shall not be by justices of assize, gaol delivery, or justices of peace, if the indictment was not found before them; and H. P. C. 140, Dalt. c. 44, 131, are cited; assuming here, as it should seem, that if the indictment were found before justices of assize and gaol delivery, they might award restitution: and see infra, *Reg. v. which may be done by 15 Rich. 2, c. 2. (e) And restitution is to be awarded only to him who is found by the indictment to have been put out of the actual possession, and not to one who was only seised in law. (f) Upon the removal of the proceedings into the Court of King's Bench by certiorari, that Court may award a restitution discretionally; and will so award, unless the defendant plead very soon, and take notice of trial within the term. (g) And the same principle applies to a judge of assize upon the finding of an indictment for forcible entry; namely, that the proceedings being ex parte, a discretion may be exercised. Where, therefore, an indictment for a forcible entry and detainer is found at the assizes, it is in the discretion of the judge whether he will grant restitution or not; and if he refuse to grant it, the Court of Queen's Bench will not inquire whether he has exercised his discretion rightly, or grant a mandamus to the judge to grant restitution. (h) But in the case of local magistrates, who are to go to the spot, and make inquiry by the inquisition of a jury, and examination of witnesses; if the jury find the facts, it is imperative on the justices to grant restitution; and the reason is that there has been a fair inquiry. (i) And where a conviction of a forcible entry was quashed in the Queen's Bench for uncertainty, but the restitution was opposed on an affidavit that the party's title (which was by lease) was expired since the conviction, the Court said they had no discretionary power in this case, but were bound to award restitution on quashing the conviction. [315]

Of the bar or stay to the award of restitution.

It appears by the proviso in the 8 Hen. 6, c. 9, and also by the 31 Eliz. c. 11, that any one indicted upon these statutes may allege quiet possession for three whole years to stay the award of restitution; in the construction of which it has been holden, that such possession must have continued without interruption during three whole years next before the indictment. (l) And it has also been said that the three years' possession must be of a lawful estate; and therefore that a disseisor can in no case justify a forcible entry or detainer against the disseisee having a right of entry, as it seems that he may against a stranger, or even against the disseisee having, by his laches, lost his right of entry. (m) Wherever such possession is pleaded in bar of a restitution, either in the King's Bench or before justices of the peace, no restitution ought to be awarded till the truth of the plea be tried; and such plea need not show under what title, or of what estate, such possession was; because not the title, but the possession only, is material. (n) If the defendant tender a traverse of the force (which must be in writing), no restitution ought to be till such traverse be tried; in order to which the justice, before whom the indictment is found, ought to award a venire for a jury: but if such jury find so much of the indictment to be true as will warrant a restitution, it will be sufficient, though they find the other part of it to be false. (o) Where the defendant pleads three years' possession in stay of restitution, according to 31 Eliz. c. 11, and it is found against him, he must pay costs. (p)

The same justices who have awarded a restitution on an indictment of forcible entry, &c., or any two or one of them, may afterwards supersede such restitution upon an insufficiency in the indictment appearing unto them: but no other justices or Court whatsoever have such power, except the Court of King's Bench; a certiorari from whence wholly closes the hands of the justices of peace, and avoids any restitution which is executed after its teste, but does not bring the justices into contempt without notice. (q)

Of superseding the restitution.

The Court of King's Bench has such a discretionary power over these matters, from an equitable construction of the statutes, that if a restitution shall appear to have been illegally awarded or executed, that Court may set it aside, and grant a re-restitution to the defendant. But a defendant cannot in any case whatsoever, ex rigore juris, demand a restitution, either upon the quashing of the indictment, or a verdict found for him on a traverse thereof, &c.; for the power of granting a restitution is vested in the Kings Bench only, by an equitable construction of the general words of the statutes, and is not expressly given by those statutes; and is never made use of by that Court but when, upon consideration of the whole circumstances of the case, the defendant shall appear to have some right to the tenements, the possession whereof he lost by the restitution granted to the prosecutor. (r)

Of setting aside the restitution.

But where a conviction for a forcible entry or detainer is quashed by the Queen's Bench they have no discretionary power, but are bound to award re-restitution, although the conviction be quashed for a merely technical error, and the lease of the dispossessed person had expired during the litigation. (s)

Where conviction is quashed re-restitution must be awarded.

The Court of King's Bench has been so favourable to one who, upon his traverse of an indictment upon these statutes being found for him, has appeared to have been unjustly put out of his possession, that they have awarded him a restitution, notwithstanding it has been shown to the Court that, since the restitution granted upon the indictment, a stranger has recovered the possession of the same land in the lord's court. (t)

The justices or justice may execute the writ of restitution in person, or may make their precept to the sheriff to do it. CHAPTER THE THIRTIETH.

OF NUISANCES.

NUISANCE, nocumentum, or annoyance, signifies anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage. And nuisances are of two kinds: public or common nuisances, which affect the public, and are an annoyance to all the King's subjects; and private nuisances, which may be defined as anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another. (a) Private nuisances, as they are remedied only by civil proceedings, do not come within the scope of this Treatise; but public or common nuisances, as they annoy the whole community in general, and not merely some particular person, are properly punishable by indictment, and not the subject of action; for it would be unreasonable to multiply suits by giving every man a separate right for what damnifies him in common only with the rest of his fellow-subjects. (b) In treating of public or common nuisances, we may consider—I. Of public nuisances in general. II. Of nuisances to public highways. III. Of nuisances to public rivers. And, IV. Of nuisances to public bridges.

Nuisances are public and private.

SEC. I.

Of Public Nuisances in General.

PUBLIC nuisances may be considered as offences against the public order and economical regimen of the state, being either the doing

(b) 4 Blac. Com. 166. There are, however, circumstances mentioned in the books upon which a party has been admitted to have a private satisfaction by civil suit for that which is a public nuisance; namely, where he has sustained some extraordinary damage by it beyond the rest of the King's subjects. As if by means of a ditch dug across a public way, which is a common nuisance, a man or his horse suffer any injury by falling therein; there, for this particular damage, not common to others, it has been held, that the party may have his action. Co. Lit. 56. 5 Rep. 73. 3 Blac. Com. 219. And see also Fowler v. Sanders. Cro. Jac. 446. But the particular damage in this case must be direct, and not consequential, as by being delayed in a journey of importance. Bull. N. P. 26. In Rex v. Dewsnap, 16 East, 196, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, 'I did not expect that it would have been disputed at this day that though a nuisance may be public, yet that there may be a special grievance, arising out of the common cause of injury, which presses more upon particular individuals than upon others not so immediately within the influence of it. In the case of stopping a common highway which may affect all the subjects, yet if a particular person sustain a special injury from it, he has an action.' And in Duncan v. Thwaites, 3 B. & C. 584, Abbott, C. J., said, 'I take it to be a general rule, that a party who sustains a special and particular injury by an act which is unlawful, on the ground of public injury, may maintain an action for his own special injury.' And see Rose v. Miles, 4 M. & S. 101. Butterfield v. Forester, 11 East, 60.

of a thing to the annoyance of all the King's subjects, or the neglecting to do a thing which the common good requires. (c) But the annoyance or neglect must be of a real and substantial nature; and the fears of mankind, though they may be reasonable, will not create a nuisance. (d)

trades and manufactures.

Offensive trades and manufactures may be public nuisances. A brewhouse, erected in such an inconvenient place that the business cannot be carried on without greatly incommoding the neighbourhood, may be indicted as a common nuisance; and so in the like case may a glasshouse or swineyard. With respect to a candle manufactory, it has been holden, that it is no common nuisance to make candles in a town, because the needfulness of them shall dispense with the noisomeness of the smell; but the reasonableness of this opinion seems justly to be questionable, because, whatever necessity there may be that candles be made, it cannot be pretended that it is necessary to make them in a town. (e)

of the nuisance depends upon the number of houses and concourse of people; and also upon its making the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable.

An indictment will not lie for that which is a nuisance only to a few inhabitants of a particular place: as where, upon an indictment against a tinman for the noise made by him in carrying on his trade, it appeared in evidence, that the noise only affected the inhabitants of three numbers of the chambers in Clifford's Inn, and that by shutting the windows the noise was in a great measure prevented, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., held that the indictment could not be sustained, as the annoyance was, if anything, a private nuisance. (f) But an indictment for a nuisance, by steeping stinking skins in water, laying it to be committed near the highway, and also near several dwelling-houses, has been held sufficient: for if a man erects a nuisance near the highway, by which the air thereabouts is corrupted, it must, in its nature, be a nuisance to those who are in the highway. (g) And an indictment was held good for a nuisance in erecting buildings, and making fires which sent forth noisome, offensive, and stinking smokes, and making great quantities of noisome, offensive, and stinking liquors, near to the King's common highway, and near to the dwelling-houses of several of the inhabitants, whereby the air was impregnated with noisome and offensive stinks and smells. (h) Upon the evidence it appeared that the smell was not only intolerably offensive, but also obnoxious and hurtful, and made many persons sick, and gave them head-aches; and it was held that it was not necessary that the smell should be unwholesome, but that it was enough if it rendered the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable; and further, that the existence of the nuisance depended upon the number of the houses and concourse of people, and was a matter of fact to be judged of by the jury. (i) Rex v. White, 1 Burr. 337, where see also that the word 'noxious' not only means hurtful and offensive to the smell, but includes the complex idea of insalubrity and offensiveness.

But the carrying on of an offensive trade is not indictable, unless it be destructive of the health of the neighbourhood, or render the houses untenable or uncomfortable. (k) If there be smells offensive to the senses that is enough, as the neighbourhood has a right to fresh and pure air. (l)

Smells offensive to the senses a nuisance.

The presence of other nuisances will not justify any one of them, or the more nuisances there were the more fixed they would be. (l) Upon an indictment for a nuisance in carrying on the trade of a varnish-maker, it was proved that offensive smells proceeded from the defendant's manufactory, to the annoyance of persons travelling along a public road, the defence was, first, that the smells were not injurious to health; and, secondly, that in the immediate neighbourhood there were several houses for slaughtering horses, a brewery, a gas manufactory, a melter of kitchen stuff, and a blood boiler; and that although the accumulation of all the smells was offensive, yet that the defendant's alone would not have been so, and therefore was no nuisance; but Abbott, C.J., said, 'It is not necessary that a public nuisance should be injurious to health; if there be smells offensive to the senses, that is enough, as the neighbourhood has a right to fresh and pure air. It has been proved that a number of other offensive trades are carried on near this place, knackers, melters of kitchen stuff, &c.; but the presence of other nuisances will not justify any one of them; or the more nuisances there were the more fixed they would be; however, one is not the less subject to prosecution because others are culpable. The only question, therefore, is this: is the business, as carried on by the defendant, productive of smells offensive to persons passing along the public highway?' (m)

Other nuisances no defence.

It appears to have been ruled, that a person cannot be indicted for setting up a noxious manufactory in a neighbourhood in which other offensive trades have long been borne with, unless the inconvenience to the public be greatly increased. (n) Where the business of a horse-boiler, which is one of the most offensive description, had been carried on, on the same premises, for many years before the defendants came to them, but its extent was much greater under them than it had been before; but the neighbourhood in which it was carried on was full at the time when they commenced the business, and long before, of establishments for carrying on trades of the most offensive character, and evidence was given that the defendants carried on their trade in so improved a manner that there was very little difference in the nuisance from what it was when they came there; it was held that this trade was, in its nature, a nuisance; but, considering the manner in which this neighbourhood had always been occupied, it would not be a nuisance unless it occasioned more inconvenience as it was carried on by the defendants than it had done before. If in consequence of the alleged improvements in the mode of conducting the business there was no increase of the annoyance, though the business itself had increased, the defendants were entitled to an acquittal; if the annoyance had increased, this was an indictable nuisance. (o)

The 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, which provides for the lighting parishes with gas, expressly enacts (sec. 54) that nothing in the Act shall prevent any person from proceeding by indictment against any of the officers, servants, or workmen of the body corporate or other persons supplying any gas, in respect of any works or other means employed by them, as a public nuisance.

A certificate and license, under the 26 Geo. 3, c. 71, s. 1, authorizing a person to keep a house for the slaughtering of horses, is no defence; and even if it were a license from all the magistrates in the county to the defendant to slaughter horses at the very place, it would not entitle the defendant to continue the business there one hour after it became a public nuisance to the neighbourhood. (p)

It has been held that a person cannot be indicted for continuing a noxious trade which has been carried on at the same place for nearly fifty years. (q) But this seems hardly to be reconcileable with the doctrine, subsequently recognised, that no length of time can legalise a public nuisance, although it may supply an answer to the action of a private individual. (r) It should seem that in judging whether a thing is a public nuisance or not, the public good it does may, in some cases, where the public health is not concerned, be taken into consideration, to see if it outweighs the public annoyance. (s) With respect to offensive works, though they may have been originally established under circumstances which would primâ facie protect them against a prosecution for a nuisance, it seems that a wilful neglect to adopt established improvements, which would make them less offensive, may be indictable.

If a noxious trade is already established in a place remote from habitations and public roads, and persons afterwards come and build houses within the reach of its noxious effects; or if a public road be made so near to it, that the carrying on the trade becomes a nuisance to the persons using the road, the party would be entitled to continue his trade, because his trade was legal before the erection of the houses and the making of the road. (t)

Evidence.

Upon an indictment for burning arsenic whereby divers unwholesome smells arose, so that the air was greatly corrupted, evidence is admissible that particles of arsenic were carried off in the vapour, and deposited in the adjoining fields, and thereby the cattle and trees were poisoned, and that several cattle had died. Where the alleged nuisance was at Liverpool, and certain effects there produced were, by the prosecution, attributed to the fumes from the defendant's manufacture; the defence was that those effects were attributable to other local causes. To meet this, Coleridge, J., admitted evidence that the same effects were found in the neighbourhood of the defendant's similar manufacture carried on in the country, where these local causes did not exist, and that the defendant had paid compensation for them; for this was clearly good evidence of the tendency of the manufacture to produce such effects. (v) But on an indictment in 1857 for a nuisance in carrying on an offensive trade, a conviction in 1855 of the defendant before justices of the peace for carrying on the same trade upon the same premises so as to occasion noxious and offensive effluvia without using the best practicable means for preventing the same, contrary to the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 128, s. 1, but before the period comprised in the indictment, is not admissible, though the manufacture may appear to have been carried on for some years in the same manner. (w)

Erecting gunpowder mills, or keeping gunpowder magazines near a town, is a nuisance by the common law, for which an indictment or information will lie. (x) And the making, keeping, or carrying, of too large a quantity of gunpowder, percussion caps, &c., at one time, or in one place or vehicle, is prohibited by the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139, (y) under heavy penalties and forfeiture.

Where a count stated that the defendants unlawfully did deposit in a warehouse belonging to them near to divers streets, highways, and dwelling-houses, divers large and excessive quantities of a dangerous ignitable and explosive fluid, called wood naphtha, and unlawfully did keep in the said warehouse, and near to the said streets, highways and houses the said fluid in such large, excessive and dangerous quantities, whereby the Queen's subjects passing along the said streets and highways and residing in the said houses were in great danger of their lives and property, and were kept in great alarm and terror; it was held that the count was good; for though the count did not state that any noxious effluvia issued from the naphtha, or that the air was corrupted by it, or that any bodily harm was done by it to anyone; yet to deposit and keep such a substance in such quantities in a warehouse so situate, to the danger of the lives and property of the Queen's subjects, is an indictable offence. The substance must be of such a nature, and kept in such large quantities and under such local circumstances, as to create real danger to life

It was so held on the ground, 1st, that the offence of which the defendant had been convicted was not necessarily a nuisance; 2nd, that even if it had been an offence precisely similar, except that it was anterior, it would not have been admissible; but Wightman, J., did not concur in this latter point.

and property. The well founded apprehension of danger, which would alarm men of steady nerves and reasonable courage, passing through the street in which the house stands, or residing in adjoining houses, is enough to show that something has been done which the law ought to prevent by pronouncing it a misdemeanor. (z)

The evidence on the trial of the above count was, that the defendants kept and stored large quantities of wood naphtha and rectified spirits of wine in a warehouse in the City of London; the quantities stored were from 4,000 to 5,000 gallons of naphtha, and from 40,000 to 50,000 gallons of spirits of wine. The two were mixed together upon the premises. For this purpose there were two large vats erected; each of them capable of holding 2,000 gallons of the mixture. The vats were covered over entirely at the top, except an aperture in the centre of the cover, in which was fixed a hopper, with a sliding panel of wood. When it was necessary to mix, the spirits of wine first and the naphtha afterwards were poured through the hopper into the vat below, where, by their chemical action upon each other, they became intermixed, and were drawn off at the bottom by a cock, and carried away for the purposes of commerce. The naphtha was kept in the warehouse in earthen casks holding twelve gallons each, and carefully stocked till required for the purpose of being thus mixed. It is a product of the distillation of wood, and is very inflammable, more so than spirits, or even gunpowder itself, passing into vapour on the application of a heat of 140° Fahrenheit, and, if inflamed, water could not put out the fire arising from it, and there was no dispute that practically a fire arising and communicating with the quantity kept upon these premises could not be quenched, and would produce very disastrous consequences to the neighbourhood; but it was the practice in the warehouse never to allow any candles or fire or gas-light to enter therein, and so long as that continued the storing of the naphtha and the spirits could not produce danger; but it was contended on the part of the Crown that to keep articles so liable to accident and so dangerous in the result, if an accident happened, to a populous neighbourhood was a public nuisance, as fire might incautiously be introduced, or a fire arising in an adjoining house might communicate therewith, and that the existence of such a manufactory, therefore, was a just ground for alarm to the surrounding neighbourhood; and, upon a case reserved upon the point, whether, when the manufacture, as carried on (which was carefully) produced in the opinion of the scientific men no danger, its liability to danger ab extra made it a public nuisance, it was held that it did. The supposed safety from within depended on the care of the defendants' servants in not allowing any candles, fire or gas-light to enter the warehouse, and it was only so long as this care continued that the naphtha could not produce danger; but the law takes notice that occasional carelessness may be reckoned upon, and forbids that to be done which, on the recurrence of carelessness, will in all probability prove destructive to life and property. As to the question whether when such a manufacture is carried on so carefully as in the opinion of scientific men to produce no danger, its liability to danger ab extra makes it a public nuisance; there is no doubt that its liability to danger ab extra may make it a public nuisance. Upon the trial of such indictments it is a question of fact for the jury whether the keeping and depositing, or the manufacturing of such substances, really does create danger to life and property as alleged; and this must be a question of degree depending upon the circumstances of each particular case. And in this case the jury were properly directed that if the depositing and keeping of the naphtha in the manner described, coupled with its liability to ignition ab extra, created danger to life and property to the degree alleged, they might find a verdict of guilty. (a)

So also, there can be no doubt that to keep such a large quantity of materials for making fireworks in a building near a street and dwelling-houses as is calculated to endanger the lives of the persons passing by and living there, is a common nuisance. (b)

Fireworks.

It appears, that persons putting on board a ship an article of a combustible and dangerous nature, without giving due notice of its contents, so as to enable the master to use proper precautions in the stowing of it, will be guilty of a misdemeanor. The case did not come before the Court of King's Bench directly upon its criminal nature: but that Court, in adverting to the conduct imputed to the defendants, declared it to be criminal; and said, 'in order to make the putting on board wrongful the defendants must be conscious of the dangerous quality of the article put on board; and if, being so, they yet gave no notice, considering the probable danger thereby occasioned to the lives of those on board, it amounts to a species of delinquency in the persons concerned in so putting such dangerous article on board, for which they are criminally liable, and punishable as for a misdemeanor at least.' (c)

Putting combustibles on board a ship.

An indictment charged the defendant with keeping certain inclosed lands, near to the King's highway and to certain houses, for the purpose of persons frequenting such grounds, and meeting therein to practise rifle shooting, and to shoot at pigeons with guns, and that he did unlawfully cause divers persons to meet there for that purpose, and did unlawfully suffer and cause a great number of idle and disorderly persons armed with guns to assemble in the streets and highways and other places near the said premises, discharging firearms and making a great noise and disturbance, by means whereof the King's subjects were disturbed and put in peril: the defendant had converted some land, about 100 feet from a public road, into a shooting ground, where persons came to practise with rifles, and to shoot at pigeons; and as the pigeons which were fired at often escaped, it was the custom for idle persons to collect outside the grounds, and in the neighhouring fields to shoot at the birds as they strayed, by which a great noise and disturbance was created; it was objected that the defendant was not responsible, as he neither committed the nuisance in his own person, nor was it his object to induce others to commit it; nor was it a necessary and inevitable consequence of any act of his, being done by persons beyond his control: and those persons being themselves amenable to punishment for it; but it was held that the evidence supported the allegation that the defendant caused such persons to assemble, and that the defendant was liable to be indicted for a nuisance; for if a person collects together a crowd of people to the annoyance of his neighbours, that is a nuisance for which he is answerable; and although it may not be his object to create a nuisance, yet if it be the probable consequence of his act, he is answerable as if it were his actual object: if the experience of mankind must lead any one to expect the result, he will be answerable for it. Disorderly inns, &c.

All disorderly inns or ale-houses, bawdy-houses, gaming-houses, play-houses, unlicensed or improperly conducted booths and stages for rope-dancers, mountebanks, and the like, are public nuisances, and may therefore be indicted. (e)

Innkeepers are
ceive travellers.

The keeper of an inn may, by the common law, be indicted and fined as being guilty of a public nuisance, if he usually harbour thieves, or persons of scandalous reputation, or suffer frequent disorders in his house, or take exorbitant prices, or set up a new inn in a place where there is no manner of need of one, to the hindrance of other ancient and well-governed inns, or keep it in a place in respect of its situation wholly unfit for such a purpose. (f) And it seems also clear that if one who keeps a common inn refuse either to receive a traveller as a guest into his house, or to find him victuals or lodging, upon his tendering him a reasonable price for the same, (g) he is not only liable to render damages to the party in an action, but may also be indicted; and it is also said, that he may be compelled by the constable of the town to receive and entertain such a person as his guest; and that it is in no way material whether he have any sign before his door or not, if he make it his common business to entertain passengers. (h) But a traveller is not entitled to select a particular apartment, or to insist upon occupying a bedroom for the purpose of sitting up all night, if the innkeeper offers to furnish him with a proper room for that purpose. (i) It is no defence to an indictment for not receiving a traveller that he did not tender a reasonable sum for his entertainment, if no objection be made on that ground: nor that the guest was travelling on a Sunday: nor that it was at a late hour of the night after the innkeeper and his family were gone to bed; for an innkeeper is bound to admit a traveller at whatever hour of the night he may arrive: nor that the guest refused to tell his name and abode, as the innkeeper had no right to insist upon knowing them: but if the guest be drunk or behave in an indecent or improper manner, the innkeeper is not bound to receive him. (k) The keeping of an inn is no franchise, but a lawful trade when not exercised to the prejudice of the public: and therefore there is no need of any license or allowance for such erection. (l) But if an inn use the trade of an alehouse, as almost all innkeepers do, it will be within the statutes made concerning ale and beer houses. (m)

The keeping a bawdy-house is a common nuisance, as it endangers the public peace by drawing together dissolute and debauched persons; and also has an apparent tendency to corrupt the manners of both sexes, by such an open profession of lewdness. (n) And it has been adjudged that this is an offence of which a feme covert may be guilty as well as if she were sole, and that she, together with her husband, may be convicted of it; for the keeping the house does not necessarily import property, but may signify that share of government which the wife has in a family as well as the husband; and in this she is presumed to have a considerable part, as those matters are usually managed by the intrigues of her sex. (o) If a person be only a lodger, and have but a single room, yet if she make use of it to accommodate people in the way of a bawdy-house, it will be a keeping of a bawdy-house as much as if she had a whole house. (p) But an indictment cannot be maintained against a person for being a common bawd, and procuring men and women to meet together to commit fornication: the indictment should be for keeping a bawdy-house. (q) For the bare solicitation of chastity is not indictable, but cognizable only in the Ecclesiastical Courts. (r)

Common gaming-houses.

Ivens*, 'I am inclined to think that the declaration is bad for want of an allegation of a tender of the amount to which the innkeeper would be reasonably entitled for the entertainment furnished to his guest; it is not sufficient for the plaintiff to allege that he was willing to pay; he should state further that he offered to pay. There may be cases where a tender may be dispensed with; as, for instance, where a man shuts up his doors or windows so that no tender can be made; but I rather think these facts ought to be stated in the indictment or declaration; and I have, therefore, some doubt as to the complete correctness of the judgment in the case cited.' In 39 Hen. 6, 19, Danby said an innkeeper is not bound to give provender to the horse of his guest until he is paid in the hand; for the law does not compel him to put trust in his guest for the payment—which fully supports Lord Abinger's opinion. See Hawthorn v. Hammond, 1 C. & K. 404, where the plaintiff had knocked at an inn door for some minutes in the night without obtaining admission; and Parke, B., left it to the jury whether the defendant heard the noise, and if so, whether she ought to have concluded that the person knocking required to be admitted as a guest or was a drunken person, who had come there to make a disturbance.

corrupt practices; and incite to idleness, and avaricious ways of gaining property, great numbers whose time might otherwise be employed for the good of the community. (s) And the keeping a common gaming-house, and for lucre and gain unlawfully causing and procuring divers idle and evil-disposed persons to frequent and come to play together at a game called 'rouge et noir,' and permitting the said idle and evil-disposed persons to remain playing at the same game for divers large and excessive sums of money, is an indictable offence at common law. (t) It has also been adjudged, that it is an offence for which a feme covert may be indicted; for, as she may be concerned in acts of bawdry, as has been observed above, so she may be active in promoting gaming, and furnishing the guests with conveniences for that purpose. (u) As an indictment for keeping a gaming-house is an indictment for a public nuisance, and not for any matter in the nature of a private injury, if the prosecutor forbears bringing the case to trial, another person may proceed with the indictment. Disorderly

An indictment against a defendant for that he did keep a common, ill-governed, and disorderly house, and in the said house for his lucre, &c., certain persons of ill-name, &c., to frequent and come together, did cause and procure, and the said persons in the said house to remain fighting of cocks, boxing, playing at cudgels, and misbehaving themselves, did permit, has been held to be good. (z) And it seems that the keeping of a cockpit is not only an indictable offence at common law, but that a cockpit is considered as a gaming-house within the 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 11, (a) which imposes a penalty of forty shillings per day upon such houses; and therefore, on a conviction on an indictment at common law, the Court will measure the fine by inflicting forty shillings for each day, according to the number of days such cockpit was kept open. are not nuisances in their own nature, but may only become such by accident; as, where they draw together such numbers of coaches or people, &c., as prove generally inconvenient to the places adjacent; or, when they pervert their original institution by recommending vicious and loose characters, under beautiful colours, to the imitation of the people, and make a jest of things commendable, serious, and useful. (c) Theatres are now put under salutary regulations by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. And places of public entertainment in the neighbourhood of London, if not properly licensed, are to be deemed disorderly houses by the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, (d) which, reciting the multitude of places of entertainment for the lower sort of people as a great cause of thefts and robberies, enacts, 'that any house, room, garden, or other place, kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind in the cities of London and Westminster, or within twenty miles thereof,' without a license from the last preceding Michaelmas quarter sessions, under the hands and seals of four of the justices, 'shall be deemed a disorderly house or place.' The Act then particularizes the mode of granting the license, makes it lawful for a constable or other person, authorized by warrant of a justice, to enter such house or place, and to seize every person found therein; and makes every person keeping such house, &c., without a license liable to a penalty of £100, and otherwise punishable as the law directs in cases of disorderly houses. (e) In the first place, the house or room must be kept with the defendant's knowledge; secondly, it must be kept for the purposes prohibited by the statute; there must be something like an habitual keeping of it, which however need not be at stated intervals; thirdly, it must be public, to which all persons have a right to go, whether gratuitously or on payment of money, no matter whether paid to the defendant or not, if he knows of the payment. (f) Where, therefore, the defendant was a publican, and music, dancing, and masquerades had occasionally been held at his house, where, from its vicinity to the Great Synagogue, Jewish marriages were frequently celebrated, but no money was taken at the door or elsewhere by the defendant for admission, and the rooms were let to a dancing master, and to other persons, who sold tickets and received money for admission at the door; but there was no direct evidence that the defendant knew of this practice; it was held, that there was evidence for the jury of keeping the house for the purposes mentioned in the Act. keeper, or manager of any such house from any penalty for keeping a disorderly house, or for the nuisance thereby occasioned. The Act extends to the metropolitan police district. By sec. 3 of 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, the Act is not to extend to the theatres in Drury Lane and Covent Garden, or the King's Theatre in the Haymarket; nor to performances and public entertainments carried on under letters patent, or license of the crown, or license of the lord chamberlain.

mere temporary or occasional use of a room for music and dancing is not a keeping it within this Act, but the room need not be kept exclusively for those purposes, nor need money be taken at the door. Where, therefore, the defendant kept a public house, and on repeated occasions, during a space of three or four months, the tap-room was frequented at night by numbers of sailors, soldiers, boys, and prostitutes, who danced there to a violin played by a person on an elevated platform, but no money was taken for admission, it was held that the case was within the Act. (h) On an indictment for unlawfully keeping a room for public music and dancing within twenty miles of London and Westminster without a license, it was proved that nightly entertainments were there given, when music and dancing took place, the public being admitted on paying money at the door. There were often from 200 to 300 visitors, who conducted themselves in an orderly manner, and no impropriety of conduct was permitted or practised: the Recorder held, that this room required a license under the Act, and that, after this proof, it lay on the defendant to prove that it was licensed. It seems also to be the better opinion, that all common stages for rope-dancers, &c., are nuisances, not only because they are great temptations to idleness, but also because they are apt to draw together numbers of disorderly persons, which cannot but be very inconvenient to the neighbourhood. The proceedings in respect of prosecutions against persons keeping bawdy-houses, gaming-houses, or other disorderly houses, are facilitated by the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, by which it is enacted, that if two inhabitants of any parish or place, paying scot and lot, give notice in writing to the constable, of any person keeping a bawdy-house, gaming-house, or any other disorderly house, in such parish or place, the constable shall go with such inhabitants to a justice, and shall, upon such inhabitants making oath before the justice that they believe the contents of the notice to be true, and entering into a recognizance in twenty pounds each to give material evidence against the person for such offence, enter into a recognizance in the sum of thirty pounds to prosecute with effect at the next sessions or assizes as to the justice shall seem meet. And provision is also made for the payment by the overseers of the charges of prosecution to the constable, and ten pounds on conviction to each of the two inhabitants. bawdy-house, gaming-house, or other disorderly house, shall be deemed and taken to be the keeper thereof, and shall be liable to be prosecuted and punished as such, notwithstanding he or she shall not, in fact, be the real owner or keeper thereof.' Sec. 9, any person may give evidence upon such prosecution, though an inhabitant of the parish or place, and though he may have entered into the before-mentioned recognizance. Sec. 10, no indictment shall be removed by certiorari, but shall be tried at the same sessions or assizes where it shall have been preferred (unless the Court shall think proper, upon cause shown, to adjourn the same,) notwithstanding any such writ or allowance. This clause has been decided not to restrain the crown from removing the indictment by certiorari; there being nothing in the Act to show that the legislature intended that the crown should be bound by it. (n) And where an indictment for keeping a disorderly house has been removed from the sessions into the Central Criminal Court under the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 36, s. 16, either by the prosecutor or defendant, the opposite party may remove it into the Court of Queen's Bench. (o) But the power of that Court to grant a certiorari at the defendant's instance to remove an indictment for keeping such a house found at the Middlesex Sessions, is taken away by the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 10, whether the prosecution be under that Act or in the ordinary course. (p)

Any number of persons may be included in the same indictment for keeping different disorderly houses, stating that they 'severally' kept, &c., such houses. (q) It seems that it is necessary to state where the house is situate, and the time, so as to make a particular statement of the offence, which is the keeping of the house. (r) But particular facts need not be stated; and though the charge is thus general, yet at the trial evidence may be given of particular facts, and of the particular time of doing them. (s) It is not necessary to prove who frequents the house, for that may be impossible: but if any unknown persons are proved to be there behaving disorderly, it is sufficient to support the indictment. (t)

Upon an indictment for keeping two bawdy-houses, the evidence, in addition to the proof of the nature of the houses, was that the defendant owned the houses, which he let to weekly tenants, and that he had been repeatedly remonstrated with as to the manner in which the houses were conducted, and called upon to interfere so as to abate the nuisance; of these warnings he took no notice, and some months before the prosecution he was served with a notice to the like effect; he, however, took no steps to stop the nuisance, but continued to go to the houses, and receive the rent every week; but it was not proved that the defendant obtained any additional rent by reason of the nature of the occupation; and it was held that the defendant was not really the keeper of the bawdy-houses in point of law: but was simply the owner of the houses, letting them to other persons who used them for an immoral purpose. Punishment

In general, all open lewdness grossly scandalous is punishable by indictment at the common law: and it appears to be an established principle that whatever openly outrages decency, and is injurious to public morals, is a misdemeanor. (a)

Open lewdness and indecent exposure.

Therefore any unlawful exposure of the private parts of an individual in a public place and in the sight of divers persons is indictable. In one case it was held that in order to constitute such an offence, it was not essential that the exposure should actually be seen by more than one person, if it were so made that it might be seen by other persons if they had looked in that direction. A French master was tried on an indictment for indecently exposing his person, and it appeared that he was seen from an opposite window by a maid-servant, but there was no evidence that any one in the street saw him, but only that persons going along the street might have seen him; Parke, B., directed the jury to consider whether he was in such a situation that the passers by in the street could have seen him had they happened to look, and if they were of that opinion to find him guilty. (b)

In order, however, to render a person indictable for indecently exposing his person, it is not sufficient that he expose his person to one female only. The indictment charged that the prisoner in a certain public and open place, called Paddington Churchyard, in the sight and to the view of Lydia C., did wilfully expose his private parts; and the Court of Queen's Bench arrested the judgment, on the ground that the nuisance must be public, that is to the injury or offence of several. (c) So where an indictment charged that the prisoner in a certain public place within a certain alehouse indecently did expose his private parts in the presence of Mary A., and of divers other the liege subjects of the Queen, and the prisoner had conducted himself in an offensive manner in the public passage from the entrance door of the public-house to the bar, but not amounting to an indecent exposure, and whilst so doing several persons passed to and fro, and he then took out and exposed his private parts to Mary A.; but there was no one in sight but herself at that time; it was held that, assuming the indictment to be sufficient, the averment respecting 'divers others' was material, and was not proved, as the exposure was only proved to have been made in the presence of one person. (d)

But where an exposure was charged on a certain public common in the presence and sight of divers persons, and the prisoners had committed fornication in open day on the said common; but there was no evidence that it was committed within the sight of any one except the witness; but it could have been seen without difficulty by other persons on the common, and the case did not state that there were any other persons on the common; the judges, after argument, differed in opinion, and no judgment was delivered. (e)

Where an indictment charged the prisoners with an indecent exposure in a public place called Farringdon Market, and it was proved that the place in question was an enclosure of Portland stone, with divisions or boxes like the urinals at railway stations, and open to the public for certain proper purposes, but otherwise enclosed, and there was an aperture in the stone-work to enable persons to look through and watch the proceedings inside; it was held that, although the place was in Farringdon Market, it was not a public place for the purpose of this indictment. (f) But where a passenger in a public omnibus for hire exposed his person for a considerable distance whilst the omnibus was passing along a street in the presence of three or four females who were

(b) Rex v. Rouverard, cited in Reg. v. Webb, infra. Query, whether this case be not shaken by that and subsequent cases. And yet it seems to rest on very sound reason. Suppose a man exposes himself in a window facing a street, whilst there are a number of females there who might see him, with intent to insult them, is he guilty of no offence because they happen not to see him? To hold that he is not, is to make the offence depend on a mere accident over which the offender has no control, instead of on the act and guilty intent of the offender himself.

(d) Reg. v. Webb, 1 Den. C. C. 338, 2 C. & K. 933. No notice was taken of the question whether the place was a public place. The indictment alleged the exposure 'in the presence of M. A. and of divers others,' &c., and the judges doubted whether it was not bad for not adding 'in their view,' and also whether 'divers others' was sufficient.

passengers therein, and saw such exposure, it was held that this was a public place. (g)

Where an indictment alleged that the two defendants in a certain open and public place called Kew Gardens, frequented by divers of the liege subjects, unlawfully did meet together for the purpose and with the intent of committing with each other openly, lewdly, and indecently in the said public place, divers nasty, wicked, filthy, lewd, beastly, unnatural and sodomitical practices, and then unlawfully, wickedly, openly, lewdly, and indecently did commit with each other, in the sight and view of divers of the liege subjects, in the said public place passing and being, divers such practices as aforesaid, the Court of Queen's Bench arrested the judgment on the ground that the indictment did not state so distinct and specific a charge as on legal principles was sufficient. (h) So where a count alleged that A. in a certain public place did lay his hands on the private parts of B., with intent to stir up in his own mind and B.'s mind unnatural and sodomitical desires and inclinations, and to incite B. to the committing with A. divers unnatural and sodomitical acts, and that B. in the said public place did permit A. so to lay his hands, and was then aiding and assisting A. in the said acts, with the like intent; the count was held bad for not describing an incitement to commit a felony in proper terms. (i)

Indictment for indecent practices.

In one case it was held to be an indictable offence for a man to undress himself on the beach and to bathe in the sea near inhabited houses, from which he might be distinctly seen; although the houses had been recently erected, and, until their erection, it had been usual for men to bathe in great numbers at the place in question. McDonald, C. B., ruled, that whatever place becomes the habitation of civilized men, there the laws of decency must be enforced. (h) And to show a being of unnatural and monstrous shape for money is a misdemeanor. (l)

By the 20 & 21 Viet. c. 83, justices are empowered to issue a warrant to search for any obscene books, papers, writings, prints, pictures, drawings or other representations kept in any house, &c., for the purpose of sale or distribution, exhibition for the purpose

(g) Reg. v. Holmes, Dears. C. C. 207. On an indictment for indecent exposure in a certain room in a dwelling-house, it appeared that the prisoners had gone into a parlour in a public-house, and committed the acts alleged, and that a maid-servant had witnessed what was done through the window of another room, and had gone for assistance, and in consequence of her representations a policeman and another witness went, and they also saw sufficient to constitute the crime. The servant was not called as a witness; and the Recorder left it to the jury whether this was a place in which such practices occurring they were likely to be witnessed by others, and there was a conviction. A count which charges the keeping obscene prints with intent to utter them is bad, as it alleges no act done; but a count which charges the procuring obscene prints with the like intent is good, as procuring is an act done. (m)

Punishment.

By the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29, whenever any person shall be convicted of any public and indecent exposure of the person, or any public selling or exposing for public sale or to public view of any obscene book, print, picture, or other indecent exhibition, the Court may sentence the offender to be imprisoned for any term now warranted by law, and also to be kept to hard labour during the whole or any part of such term of imprisonment.

Eaves droppers.

Eaves droppers, or such as listen under walls or windows, or the eaves of a house, to hearken after discourse, and thereupon to frame slanderous and mischievous tales, are a common nuisance, and presentable at the Court Leet; or are indictable at the sessions, and punishable by fine and finding sureties for their good behaviour. Common scold.

A common scold, communis rixatrix (for our law confines it to the feminine gender), is a public nuisance to her neighbourhood, and may be indicted for the offence; and, upon conviction, punished by being placed in a certain engine of correction called the trebucket, or cucking stool. (o) And she may be convicted without setting forth the particulars in the indictment; (p) though the offence must be set forth in technical words, and with convenient certainty; and the indictment must conclude not only against the peace, but to the common nuisance of divers of his Majesty's liege subjects. consequently, the owner may be indicted for suffering him to go at large. (u)

There are also some offences which are declared to be nuisances by the enactments of particular statutes, and where a statute declares a particular thing to be a common nuisance, it is indictable as such. An Act of Parliament prohibited the erection of any building within ten feet of a road, and declared that if any such building should be erected, it should be deemed a common nuisance. By another clause, justices were empowered to convict the proprietor and occupier of such building; it was held that the party who erected a building contrary to the Act might be indicted for a nuisance. By the 10 & 11 Will. 3, c. 17, all lotteries are declared to be public nuisances; and all grants, patents, and licenses, for such lotteries to be against law. But for many years it was found convenient to the Government to raise money by the means of them; and accordingly different state lottery Acts were passed to license and regulate offices for lotteries. (w) But the 42 Geo. 3, c. 119, declares all games or lotteries, called Little-goes, to be public nuisances, and provides for their suppression; and also imposes heavy penalties upon persons keeping offices, &c., for lotteries not authorized by Parliament. (x) An indictment lies on sec. 1 of each of these Acts for keeping a lottery. (xx)

It is laid down in the books that any one may pull down, or otherwise destroy, a common nuisance; and it is said that if any one, whose estate is, or may be, prejudiced by a private nuisance, may justify the entering into another's ground and pulling down and destroying such nuisance, surely it cannot but follow à fortiori that any one may lawfully destroy a common nuisance. (y) And it is also said that in a plea justifying the removal of a nuisance, the party need not show that he did as little damage as might be; (z) but this may, perhaps, be doubted, as, even where there is a judgment to abate a nuisance, it is only to abate so much of the thing as makes it a nuisance. (zz)

of nuisances.

It has since been held, that if there be a nuisance in a highway a private individual cannot of his own authority abate it, unless it does him special injury, and he can only interfere with it as far as is necessary to exercise his right of passing along the highway, and he cannot justify doing any damage to the property of the (u) Burn's Just. tit. Nuisance, 1. And see a precedent of an indictment for this offence, 3 Chit. Crim. Law, 643. It should be observed, however, that the offence seems to be stated too generally in the authority from which the text is taken. To permit a ferocious mastiff or bull-dog to go at large and unmuzzled may be a nuisance; but those dogs are frequently quiet and gentle in their habits, except when incited by their owners; and it can hardly be said to be a nuisance to permit them to go at large and unmuzzled, because some of their breed are ferocious.

person who has improperly placed the nuisance in the highway, if, avoiding it, he might have passed on with reasonable convenience. (a)

Of the prohibition of them by writ from the King's Bench.

It is also stated as the better opinion, that the Court of King's Bench may, by a mandatory writ, prohibit a nuisance, and order that it shall be abated; and that the party disobeying such writ will be subject to an attachment. (b) Such writs appear to have been granted in some cases; and the proceeding in one case was that the judges, upon view, ordered a record to be made of the nuisance, and sending for the offender, ordered him to enter into a recognizance not to proceed; but he refusing to comply, the Court committed him for the contempt, issuing a writ to the sheriff on the record made to abate the building, and ordered the offender to be indicted for the nuisance. (c)

Of the indictment of nuisance.

But the more usual course of proceeding in cases of nuisance is by indictment, in which the nuisance should be described according to the circumstances; and it should be stated to be continuing, if that be the fact. (d) An indictment for carrying on offensive works may state them to be carried on at such a parish. It is not necessary to state that they were carried on in a town or village; (e) stating them to be carried on near a common King's highway, and near the dwelling-houses of several persons, to the common nuisance of passengers and of the inhabitants, is sufficient: it need not be stated how near the highway or houses they were carried on. (f) The offence should formerly have been charged to be done ad commune nocumentum, 'to the common nuisance of all the liege subjects,' &c. (g) But the want of such a conclusion is cured by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24. (h)

Defence.

In some cases it is no defence to show that the premises, out of which the nuisance arises, are in the occupation of a tenant, for the receipt of the rent is an upholding of the nuisance.

Where a landlord is liable for a nuisance from premises in the occupation of tenants.

If the owner of land erect a building which is a nuisance, or of which the occupation is likely to produce a nuisance, and let the land, he is liable to an indictment for such nuisance being continued or created during the term. So he is if he let a building, which requires particular care to prevent the occupation from being a nuisance, and the nuisance occur for want of such care on the part of the tenant. (i) If a man purchase premises with a nuisance upon them, though there be a demise for a term at the time of the purchase, so that the purchaser has no opportunity of removing the nuisance, yet by purchasing the reversion he makes himself liable for the nuisance. But if, after the reversion is purchased, the nuisance be erected by the occupier, the reversioner incurs no liability; yet in such a case, if there were only a tenancy from year to year, or any short period, and the landlord chose to renew the tenancy after the tenant had erected the nuisance, that would make the landlord liable. (k) Where, therefore, the defendant was in the receipt of the rents of some dwelling-houses, let for short periods to tenants, and two privies and a sink belonging to them were used in common by the occupiers of the houses; it did not appear whether any of the present tenants commenced occupying the houses before the defendant began to receive the rents; but the privies and sink were used by the tenants of those premises before his time; there was no distinct proof of any actual demise of the privies and sink, but they had regularly been cleansed by the persons occupying the houses, until the time of the nuisance, when the cleansing had been neglected; the nuisance had arisen since the defendant began to receive the rents; it was held that the defendant was liable to be indicted for the nuisance. (l) This case underwent great consideration in a recent case where the Court said, 'If Rex v. Pedley is to be considered as a case, in which the defendant was held liable because he had demised the buildings when the nuisance existed; or because he had relet them after the user of the buildings had created a nuisance; or because he had undertaken the cleansing and had not performed it; we think the judgment right. But if it is to be taken as a decision that a landlord is responsible for the act of his tenant in creating a nuisance, by the manner in which he uses the premises demised; we think it goes beyond the principle to be found in any previously decided cases, and cannot assent to it;' for 'if a landlord lets premises, not in themselves a nuisance, but which may or may not be used by the tenant so as to become a nuisance, and it is entirely at the option of the tenant so to use them or not, and the landlord receives the same benefit whether they are so used or not, the landlord cannot be made responsible for the acts of the tenant; and à fortiori he would not be liable if he had taken an obligation from the tenant not to use them so as to create a nuisance, even without reserving a right to enter and abate a nuisance if created.' (m)

It is no defence for a master or employer that a nuisance is caused by the acts of his servants, if such acts are done in the course of their employment; for if persons for their own advantage employ servants to conduct works, they are answerable for what is done by those servants. (n)

It will be no excuse for the defendant that the nuisance, for which he is indicted, has been in existence for a great length of

It has since been held that an action lies against a person who lets premises with a ruinous chimney upon them, which afterwards falls and injures an adjoining building, on the ground that if the wrong causing the injury arises from the non-feasance or misfeasance of the lessor, the party suffering the injury may sue him. *Todd v. [331]

Of the judgment in cases of nuisance.

time; as, however twenty years' acquiescence may bind parties whose private rights only are affected, yet the public have an interest in the suppression of public nuisances though of longer standing. (o) It has been held that a party could not defend the putting his woodstack in the street before his house, on the ground that it was according to the ancient usage in the town, leaving sufficient room for passengers: for it is against law to prescribe for a nuisance. (p) And Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, in one case, 'It is immaterial how long the practice may have prevailed, for no length of time will legitimate a nuisance. The stell fishery across the river at Carlisle had been established for a vast number of years, but Buller, J., held that it continued unlawful, and gave judgment that it should be abated.' (q) But in some cases length of time may concur with other circumstances in preventing an obstruction from having the character of a nuisance: as where, upon an indictment for obstructing a highway by depositing bags of clothes there, it appeared that the place had been used for a market for the sale of clothes for above twenty years, and that the defendant put the bags there for the purpose of sale; Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, that after twenty years' acquiescence, it appearing to all the world that there was a fair or market kept at the place, he could not hold a man to be criminal who came there under the belief that it was such fair, or market, legally instituted. (r)

If the indictment be so general that it does not convey sufficient information to the defendant to enable him to prepare his defence, the Court will order the prosecutor to give the defendant a particular of the several acts of nuisance he intends to prove. (s) And where the indictment is for the obstruction or non-repair of highways which are described generally, a particular of the several highways obstructed or out of repair may be obtained. (t)

All common nuisances are regularly punishable by fine and imprisonment: but, as the removal of the nuisance is usually the chief end of the indictment, the Court will adapt the judgment to the nature of the case. Where the nuisance, therefore, is stated in the indictment to be continuing, and does in fact exist at the time of the judgment, the defendant may be commanded by the judgment to remove it at his own costs: (u) but only so much of the thing as causes the nuisance ought to be removed; as if a house be built too high, only so much of it as is too high should be pulled down; and if the indictment were for keeping a dye-house, or carrying on any other stinking trade, the judgment would not be to pull down the building where the trade was carried on. (v) So in the case of a glass-house, the judgment was to abate the nuisance, not by pulling the house down, but only by preventing the defendant from using it again as a glass-house. (w) But where the indictment does not state the nuisance to be continuing, a judgment to abate it would not be proper. In a case where this point arose, Lord Kenyon, C. J., said, 'When a defendant is indicted for an existing nuisance, it is usual to state the nuisance and its continuance down to the time of taking the inquisition; it was so stated in Rex v. Pappineau, et adhuc existit; and in such cases the judgment should be that the nuisance be abated. But in this case it does not appear in the indictment that the nuisance was then in existence; and it would be absurd to give judgment to abate a supposed nuisance which does not exist. If, however, the nuisance still continue, the defendant may be again indicted for continuing it.' (x)

The 5 Will. & M. c. 11, s. 3, enacts, that if a defendant prosecuting a writ of certiorari (as mentioned in the Act) be convicted of the offence for which he is indicted, the Court of King's Bench shall give reasonable costs to the prosecutor if he be the party grieved, or be a justice, &c., or other civil officer, who shall prosecute for any fact that concerned them as officers to prosecute or present. Upon this clause it was decided, that persons dwelling near to a steam-engine, which emitted volumes of smoke affecting their breath, eyes, clothes, furniture, and dwelling-houses, and prosecuting an indictment for such nuisance, are parties grieved entitled to their costs, the defendants having removed the indictment from the sessions by certiorari, and been afterwards convicted. (y)

The 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 41, reciting the great inconvenience and injury sustained from the improper construction and negligent use of furnaces employed in the working of engines by steam, and that though such nuisance, being of a public nature, is abateable as such by indictment, the expense had deterred parties suffering thereby from seeking the remedy given by law, enacts that 'it shall and may be lawful for the Court by which judgment ought to be pronounced, in case of conviction on any such indictment, to award such costs as shall be deemed proper and reasonable to the prosecutor or prosecutors, to be paid by the party or parties so convicted as aforesaid; such award to be made either before or at the time of pronouncing final judgment, as to the Court may seem fit.'

Sec. 2, if it shall appear to the Court by which judgment ought to be pronounced that the grievance may be remedied by altering the construction of the furnace, it shall be lawful for the Court, without the consent of the prosecutor, to make such orders as shall be by the Court thought expedient for preventing the nuisance in future, before passing final sentence on the defendant.

The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 128, 18 & 19 Vict. cc. 116, 121, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, contain numerous excellent provisions for the removal of nuisances and the prevention of diseases, but they do not fall within the scope of this work.

SEC. II.

Of Nuisances to Public Highways.

Of nuisances to public highways.

IN treating of nuisances to public highways, we may consider, in the first place, what is a public highway; secondly, of nuisances to a public highway by obstruction; and, thirdly, of nuisances to a public highway by the neglect, on the part of those who are liable, to put it in repair.

The word highway originally denoted a public way, which was raised above the level of the lands through which it ran. Such ways are of extreme antiquity. When the Israelites asked leave to pass through Edom, they said, (a) ‘We will go by הַמִּסְלָה,’ the raised road or highway. (b) And it is very remarkable that the same way is called just before, (c) דֶּרֶךְ הַמֶּלֶךְ, the king’s track (d) or way. So that here we have the well-known expression, ‘the king’s highway,’ which in our old records is alta regia via, (e) and in our year books haut chemin le Roy. (f) Long ago, however, highway has been applied not only to every public way on land but also on water.

What is a public highway.

Highway is said to be the genus of all public ways; (g) of which there are three kinds: a footway; (h) a foot and horseway, which is also a pack and prime-way; and a foot, horse and cart-way. (i) Whatever distinctions may exist between these ways, it seems to be clear that any of them, when common to all the King’s subjects, whether directly leading to a market-town, or beyond a town as a thoroughfare to other towns, or from town to town, may properly be called a highway; and that the last, or more considerable of them, has been usually called the King’s

(a) Numb. xx. 19.

(b) Isai. lxii. 11, shows this to be the correct meaning of the word.

(c) Numb. xx. 17.

(d) The English word ‘track’ is either from the Hebrew word, d being changed into t, or from the Arabic طريق which is from the Hebrew with a similar change.

(g) Reg. v. Salsitill, 6 Mod. 255.

(h) Where a perambulator, eighteen inches wide and fourteen pounds weight, was pushed along a public footway leading from a road into a square, Byles, J., left it to the jury to say whether this was a usual accompaniment of a large class of foot passengers, and so small and light as neither to be a nuisance to other passengers or injurious to the soil. highway. (h) But a way to a parish church, or to the common fields of a town, or to a private house, or perhaps to a village, which terminates there, and is for the benefit of the particular inhabitants of such parish, house, or village only, is not a highway, because it belongs not to all the King's subjects, but only to some particular persons, each of whom, as it seems, may have an action on the case for a nuisance therein. (l) But in a case, (m) where a public footway was described as leading to a parish church, it appeared that the way led to an inclosure containing the site of the old parish church, which had been pulled down, and the new parish church, and that the path formerly went to the old church, and a new path led from it to the new church, and it was left to the jury whether the path up to the new church had been dedicated to the public, and a verdict found for the crown, and no objection was made on the ground that there could not be a public way to a church. And where a road led to the house of the vicar of a parish and of three other persons, and to the parish church, but terminated there, and was not a thoroughfare, and the justices made an order under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 73, to remove a quantity of rubbish from it; it was held that they had jurisdiction to determine whether this was a highway or not. (n) In one case, a very learned judge said, he had great difficulty in conceiving that there can be a public highway which is not a thoroughfare, because the public at large cannot well be in the use of it. (o) It has been held, that where there never was a right of thoroughfare a jury might find that no public way existed; but it has never been settled that, where there had been a public right of passing through, the right of way was abolished by stopping one end of the passage by a legal order of justices. If the stoppage were legally made, that would not make the remaining passage not public. (p) And where a public footway extended into two parishes, it was held that certain inclosure commissioners might stop up so much of the footway as lay in one of the parishes, and it seems to have been considered that the part which lay in the other parish remained a public way. (q)

It has since been expressly held, that there may be a public way over a place which is not a thoroughfare, and that it is a question for the jury whether it does exist or not. Where therefore a court opening into a public street had no thoroughfare through it, but contained fourteen or fifteen houses, and had been paved by commissioners under the 12 Geo. 3, c. 68, and always lighted by the parish, and the jury found that it was a public highway; it was held that there might be a highway under these circumstances. (r) So a large square with only one entrance, or a promenade, the owner of which has, for many years, permitted all persons to go into and round it, may become a public highway. (s)

of passage all over a close.

A question here presents itself whether there may not exist a public right of walking over a close in every direction, though there be but one entrance to the close. There certainly may be such a private right. A plaintiff alleged a right of private way over and along the terrace walk, and a user of that way for many years was proved, and also a grant of the free liberty, use, benefit and privilege of the terrace walk with other inhabitants; it was objected that the right proved was not a right of way, but a right to use the walk for pleasure only. That the right was altogether different from the right of way claimed. It was like the privilege which the builder of a square, who reserves the centre for a garden common to all the houses, grants to the tenants of the houses of walking about the garden; but the objection was overruled. Patteson, J., 'I do not understand the distinction that has been contended for between a right to walk, pass and repass, forwards and backwards over every part of a close, and a right of way from one part of a close to another. What is a right of way but a right of way to go forwards and backwards from one place to another?' Wightman, J., 'The right proved is a right of passage backwards and forwards over every part of the close; the right claimed is less than this; but it is included in it, being a right of way from one part of the close to another.' (t) In an old case a defendant prescribed that all the inhabitants of a vill from time immemorial had been used to dance in a close at all times of the year at their free will for their recreation, and it was held that this was a good custom. (u) Now coupling these decisions with those as to public highways where there are no thorough-

(r) Bateman v. Bluck, 18 Q. B. 870.

In Campbell v. Lang, 1 Macq. Sco. Ap. C. 451, a public way terminating at the interior of the confluence of two rivers was claimed, and it was held that such a way might exist, as it might go further on so as ultimately to reach a good terminus; but Lord Cranworth, C., doubted whether there could be 'a public right of way from a given public place, but neither terminating in a public place nor leading to a public place' by the law of Scotland 'any more than it is by the law of England.' In Young v. Cuthbertson, 1 Macq. Sco. Ap. C. 455, on the trial of an issue whether there existed a public right of way from Burntisland through the appellant's lands to Staleyburn and Aberdour, after a verdict for the respondents, it was objected that the judge was wrong in holding it not necessary that a public way should terminate in a public place. Lord Cranworth 'Suppose a right of way from Hyde Park Corner to the Addison Road. It would not be necessary to prove that the Addison Road had been a public place for forty years. It would be enough to show that the way was public to Oxford. Besides, it may not always be indispensable to show an exit. The way may terminate in a cul de sac, such as Connaught Place;' and in giving judgment his Lordship added, 'then it is said that the issue was objectionable for this reason, that Staleyburn is not a public place; but even supposing that Staleyburn is not a public place, still if the right of way went beyond it, that would be sufficient. If, indeed, Staleyburn had been a mere private house, to which the public had been in the habit of going from Burntisland and returning back again, I believe the case would not have properly come within the description of a public right of way; for the owner might destroy the house, and shut up the way, and then there would be an end of it. But here the right of way extended further, it had a public terminus at each end.' No authority is referred to in either of these cases. See Reg. v. Hawkhurst, post, p. 466.

fares, it may fairly be inferred that the public may in point of law have a right of passing and repassing over every part of a close, whatever its shape or size may be.

It is not to be understood by the term cart-way, that the way is to be used only with the particular vehicle called a cart; for if it is a common highway for carriages, it is a highway for all manner of things. (v) Many public highways however, as a footway, are to be used only in a particular mode. Thus, though a towing-path is to be used only by horses employed in towing vessels, yet it is a common highway for that purpose. (w) And where a railway or tram-road was made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, by which the proprietors were incorporated, and by which it was provided that the public should have the beneficial enjoyment of it, such railway or tram-road was taken to be a public highway. (x)

The number of persons who may be entitled to use the way, or may be obliged to repair it, will not make it a public way, if it be not common to all the King's subjects. Thus, where the commissioners under an inclosure Act set out a private road for the use of the inhabitants of nine parishes, directing the inhabitants of six of those parishes to keep it in repair, it was held that no indictment could be supported against those six parishes for not repairing it, because it did not concern the public. It was argued, amongst other reasons in support of the indictment, that there was no other remedy, for that there were not less than 250 persons who were liable to the repair of the road, and that the difficulty of suing so many persons together was almost insuperable. But the Court said that, however convenient it might be that the defendants should be indicted, there was no legal ground on which this indictment could be supported; that the known rule was that those matters only which concerned the public were the subject of an indictment; that the road in question, being described to be a private road, did not concern the public, nor was of a public nature, but merely concerned the individuals who had a right to use it; and that the question was not varied by the circumstance that many individuals were liable to repair, or that many others were entitled to the benefit of this road. (y)

Though a highway is said to be the King's, yet this must be understood as meaning that in every highway the King and his subjects may pass and repass at their pleasure; for the freehold and all the profits, as trees, mines, &c., belong to the lord of the soil, or to the owner of the lands on both sides the way. (z) The rights, however, of the owner of the soil will be subject to those of the public as to their exercise of their right of way in its full extent. Thus it seems to be established, that if a common highway is so foundrous and out of repair as to become impassable, or even dangerous to be travelled over, or incommodious, the public

The number of persons using a way or repairing it will not make it a public way if it be not common to all the king's subjects.

The freehold and the profits (as mines, trees, &c.,) of a highway belong to the lord of the soil.

Right of the public to go out of a highway.

have a right to go upon the adjacent ground; and that it makes no difference whether such ground be sown with grain or not. (a) But it is a right of passage only which is given up by the owner of the soil, even where the way is dedicated by him to the public. Thus where, in an action of trespass, a case was made that the place where the supposed trespass was committed was formerly the property of the plaintiff, who some years ago had built a street upon it, which had ever since been used as a highway, that the defendant had lands contiguous, parted only by a ditch, over which ditch he had laid a bridge, the end of which rested on the highway; and it was insisted, for the defendant, that by the plaintiff's having made this a street, it was a dedication of it to the public, and that he could not therefore sue as for a trespass on his private property; the Court held that though it was a dedication to the public, so far as the public had occasion for it, which was only for a right of passage, it never was understood to be a transfer of the absolute property in the soil. (b)

A way may become public by a dedication of it by the owner of the soil to the public use.

A way may become a public highway by a dedication of it, by the owner of the soil, to the public use. Thus where the owners of the soil suffered the public to have the free passage of a street in London, though not a thoroughfare, for eight years, without any impediment (such as a bar set across the street, and shut at pleasure, which would show the limited right of the public), it was held a sufficient time for presuming dereliction of the way to the public. (c) So where a street, communicating with a public road at each end, had been used as a public road for four or five years, it was held the jury might presume a dedication. (d) And though if the land had been under lease during that time, or even for a much longer period, the acquiescence of the tenant would not have bound the landlord, without evidence of his knowledge; (e) yet it was held, that where a way had been used by the public for a great number of years over a close in the hands of a succession of tenants, the privity of the landlord, and a dedication by him to the public might be presumed, although he was never in the actual possession of the close himself, and was not proved to have been near the spot. (f) And it was also held in this case that where a way has been so used, notice of the fact to the steward is notice to the landlord. (g) In a case where it appeared that a passage, leading from one part to another of a public street (though by a very circuitous route) made originally for private convenience, had been open to the public for a great number of years, without any bar or chain across it, and without any interruption having been given to persons passing through it, it was ruled, that this must be considered as a way dedicated to the public. (h) But the erection of a bar, to prevent the passing of carriages, rebuts the presumption of a dedication to the public; although the bar may have been long broken down: and though such a bar do not impede the passing of persons on foot, no public right to a footway is acquired, as there can be no partial abandonment to the public. (i) And it has been ruled that the owner of the soil may replace the bar after it has been taken away for twelve years. (k) Where land is vested in fee in trustees for certain public purposes, they may dedicate the surface to the use of the public as a highway, provided such use be not inconsistent with the purposes for which the land is vested in them. Commissioners for drainage, being authorized by an Act to make drains and dispose of the earth in forming banks on the sides thereof, made a drain, and with the earth taken from it made a bank on one side of it, which had been used for twenty-five years, as a public highway: it not appearing that the cleansing of the drains or any other purpose of the Act had been or was likely to be interfered with by such user of the soil, it was held that a dedication might be made by the commissioners. (l) So a canal company may dedicate a way to the public, as other persons or corporate bodies may do. They are the masters of their own property; and though they may be answerable to the rest of the proprietors for failure of duty, there is no reason why the public may not by user gain a right of way against them as well as against any other individuals. (m) But it seems that there must be some owner who can dedicate the way to the public, otherwise the road will not become a public way. (n) In every case the facts must be such as are sufficient to show that the owner meant to give the public a right of way over his soil, before a dedication by him will be presumed. Thus in a case, where the plaintiff erected a street, leading out of a highway across his own close, and terminating at the edge of the defendant's adjoining close, which was separated by the defendant's fence from the end of the street for twenty-one years, during nineteen of which the houses were completed, and the street publicly watched, cleansed and lighted, and both footways and half the horseway paved, at the expense of the inhabitants: it was held, that this street was not so dedicated to the public, that the defendant, pulling down his wall, might enter it at the end adjoining to his land, and use it as a highway. (o) And nothing done by a lessee without the consent of the owner of the fee will give a right of way to the public. Thus in a case of an action of trespass, and a justification under a public right of way, the facts

I never could discover when the dedication began: he says that during the lease there was no dedication, but that eight years' acquiescence afterwards were sufficient: he says that in another case, six years were held to be enough, not naming the case;—if six, why not one? Why not half a year? It would then become necessary for every reversioner, coming into possession of his estate after a lease, instantly to put up fences all round his property, to prevent dedication.' And see Rex v. Hudson, 2 Str. 909.

There must be the consent of the owner in fee.

There must be an intention to dedicate, but this may be inferred from long user by the public, even though it does not appear who the owner of the land was.

were, that the place in question, which was not a thoroughfare, had been under lease from 1719 to 1818; but had been used by the public, as far back as living memory could go; and had been lighted, paved and watched, under an Act of Parliament, in which it was mentioned as one of the streets of Westminster; and that the plaintiff, who inclosed it after 1818, had previously lived for twenty-four years in its neighbourhood. But it was held, that even under these circumstances the jury were well justified in finding that there was no public right of way, inasmuch as there could be no dedication to the public by the tenants for ninety-nine years, nor by any one, except the owner of the fee. (p) There cannot be a public way by dedication, unless there be some evidence to show, that the owner has consented to the use of the way; the consent of the lessee is not sufficient, because it cannot bind the owner of the inheritance. A public footway over crown land was extinguished by an inclosure Act, but for twenty years after the inclosure took place the public continued to use the way; it was held that this use was not evidence of a dedication to the public, as it did not appear to have been with the knowledge of the crown. (q) If there be an old way running along the side of my land, and, by my fences decaying, the public come on my land, that is no dedication. (r)

In order to constitute a valid dedication to the public of a highway by the owner of the soil, it is clearly settled that there must be an intention to dedicate—there must be an animus dedicandi—of which the user by the public is evidence and no more; and a single act of interruption by the owner is of much more weight upon a question of intention to dedicate than many acts of enjoyment, (s) but it is sufficient to show that there has been such a user by the public as satisfies the jury that a dedication to the public was intended by the owner, whoever he might be. Thus where a road had originally been set out under a private inclosure Act over part of the waste of a manor, and had been used by the public generally ever since it had been so set out, being a period of fifty years, and a portion of the waste had been allotted to the lord in respect of his interest in the soil, it was contended that the soil of the road had been taken out of the lord, and transferred to no other person, and that therefore there was no owner or none against whom a dedication could be presumed; for that there must have been an owner who knew that he was so, or his consent to the public user could not be presumed; and that if the crown were the owner, stronger evidence would be necessary to raise a presumption of a dedication than if the owner had been a private person. But the Court of Queen's Bench held that a dedication might be presumed even against the crown from long acquiescence in public user, and that the jury were rightly directed to consider whether the owner, whoever he might be, had consented to the public user in such a manner as to satisfy the jury that he intended to dedicate a highway to the public. (t)

On an indictment for obstructing a highway it appeared that the way had been laid out as a projected street in 1827, and used as a highway till 1836, when the defendants began to obstruct it, and soon after enclosed a part of the road. The owners of the soil of the greater part of the road brought ejectment; and, after negotiations between them and the defendants, the latter agreed to open the road, but finally in 1853 broke off the negotiations, assigning as a reason that they had, since the negotiations commenced, acquired the fee of another part of the road, on which was the obstruction in question. It was shown that that spot had been part of an estate settled in strict settlement in 1823, on a tenant for life, with power to grant building leases, and for the trustees of the settlement to sell with the consent of the tenant for life. The first tenant in tail was an infant at the time of the trial. The tenant for life proved that in 1828 the whole of the property had been sold by his trustees, and that he had had nothing to do with it since. The jury were told that there was evidence that the way had been for several years actually used by the public, from which user a dedication might be inferred, and were asked whether they inferred that there was a dedication, and at what time and by whom; and they found that there was a dedication in 1829 by whoever was then owner of the fee. And it was held that this direction was right; for when there is satisfactory evidence of such a user of a road, as to time, manner and circumstances, as would lead to the inference that there was a dedication by the owner of the fee, if it was shown who he was, it is not necessary to inquire who the individual was from whom the dedication, necessarily inferred from such user, first proceeded; and when such user is proved the onus lies on the person who seeks to deny the inference from it, to show negatively that the state of the title was such that that dedication was impossible, and that no one capable of dedicating existed. That here the statement of the defendants that they acquired the fee in 1853, and of the tenant for life that he had had nothing to do with the property since 1828, was evidence that the fee was not subject in 1829 to the settlement, and therefore there was nothing to rebut the inference from the public user at that time. (u)

It is not enough, however, to establish the right of the public, that the persons using the way reasonably believed, from the conduct of the owner, that they had acquired a right to it; an actual intention on the part of the owner to dedicate must be shown. (v)

Where it appeared that a road ran from a highway to the lodge of a park as a carriage-way, but there was no road through the park but a bridleway leading to another highway; the park gates

User by the public for a sufficient length of time as of right of a road, is evidence from which assent on the part of the owner, whoever he may be, is prima facie to be inferred.

Insufficient evidence of dedication.

were sometimes locked, but persons on foot and on horseback were allowed to pass through the park; but after rain, when the road was liable to be cut up, carriages were refused admission: there was no actual thoroughfare beyond the park gates, but there were private roads leading from the road to two farms; the surveyor of highways had been in the habit of taking stone from the park to repair the road, and had, after supplying other stone, used the whole for the purpose of repair; the parish, in conjunction with the adjoining parish, had done the repairs from time immemorial; and the road was used by every one who thought fit to use it, but there had not been any user of the road by the public except for the purpose of going to the park to seek admission there; and it was held that this was not such a dedication as would make the road a public highway. (w)

Where the question was as to a right of way over a farm, it was not disputed that the road was a footway or a bridleway. A former lessee of the farm had made it for his own use. Persons had been allowed to pass along it on foot and on horseback, but heavy carts had been turned back, and there had always been gates. In 1838 permission had been asked to use the road, and in 1848 the defendant had agreed to pay something yearly for leave to use it, as was alleged, but as he said only to repair it. The parish had never repaired it. The way was claimed as a public way to Croham Hurst, an eminence which commands a pleasant prospect, and is therefore a resort for parties of pleasure. Bailiffs of former tenants, going back fifty or sixty years, gave evidence of the user of the right, and absence of all obstruction. Erle, J., told the jury that the question was whether they were satisfied that there had been a dedication of the road to the public by the owner. If all the Queen's subjects had used the way at their free will at all times, that was strong evidence of such a dedication as a highway. But the evidence of such a user was to be well weighed, with reference to gates, to repairs, to permission, and the like. It was a matter of common experience that there were many farm roads which, as means of communication, were of great convenience, and which many persons used a long time before it became worth the owner's while to resort to any measures to prevent it. On the other hand, the fact of payment for the user would not be conclusive against the right, for it might be that a man was not in a position to enforce the right. Still it was a strong piece of evidence against the right. The strongest evidence in favour of the right was that of the bailiffs of former owners; for it would be within their province to prevent trespasses. Easy-minded men would not, however, be prepared to contest every user; and it was matter for the jury whether the evidence tended to show a farm road, or a highway for all the world, and whether the user as a highway had been submitted to by the owners. Beyond all doubt there might be user of a highway for purposes of pleasure. It was very material that there had been no repair by the parish, though this was not conclusive. (x)

(w) Reg. v. Hawkhurst, 7 Law T. 268. Cockburn, C. J., thought the facts explained the user; and Wightman, J., thought the repairs might be referred to the bridleway. It was not doubted that there might be a highway, which was not a thoroughfare. See ante, p. 459.

(x) Mildred v. Weaver, 3 F. & F. 30.

Upon an indictment for stopping up a highway, witnesses, chiefly seafaring people, having proved that they had used the way without interruption for a great number of years; it was proposed to prove that the directions of the predecessor of the defendant to his servants were to allow seafaring men and pilots to make use of the way for purposes connected with their calling, but to turn back other persons. Pollock, C. B., 'Even supposing these instructions to have been given and acted on, yet, unless it can be proved that they were communicated to the persons who used the path, and that they did so by virtue thereof, and not of right, their user was a user by the public, and the right of the way has been gained, if the user has been long enough. I do not think that such evidence, taken alone, would be relevant.' (y) Where there was a piece of garden ground in front of a house, with a fence on the side of a footpath and a road respectively, and there was a gate, which was kept bolted, at the footpath side, leading to the door of the house, and also gate-posts, but no gate near to the house at the road side, and people had frequently passed across the garden, but the defendant swore that they had no right to go that way, and that he had repeatedly sent persons back; it was held that there was no evidence to go to the jury of a public way. (z)

Directions of owner to permit persons to pass.

Insufficient user of a way.

In determining whether or not a way has been dedicated to the public, the intention of the proprietor must be considered. If it appear only that he has suffered a continual user, that may prove a dedication: but such proof may be rebutted by evidence of acts showing that he contemplated a license only resumable in a particular event. Thus where the owner of land agreed with the Thorncliffe Iron Company, and with the inhabitants of a hamlet repairing its own roads, that a way over his land should be open to carriages, that the company should pay him £5 a year, and supply cinders for the repair of the road, and that the hamlet should lead and spread them, and from that time the road was used as a carriage-road without obstruction for nineteen years, when disputes arose, and the passage along the road with carriages was interrupted, and the interruption acquiesced in for five years: it was held that the evidence showed no dedication, but only a license to use the road, resumable on breach of the agreement. (a) So where in order to show that a road is a public highway evidence is given that repairs have been done to it by the surveyor of highways, it is competent to prove an agreement between the surveyor and an agent of a landowner, which tends to explain such repairs, and to show that the road had not been repaired as a parish road, but under a private bargain. (b)

Intention of the owner.

Repairs may be explained.

Where the owner of the soil has been under a compulsory obligation to permit a qualified passage over his soil, the circumstance of a general passage having been used by the public for many years will not lead to the conclusion of a dedication to the public. Thus where a road was set out by commissioners under a local Act, and certain persons only were by the Act to use it, but in fact it had been used by the public for nearly seventeen years, it was held, that this was not sufficient evidence of a dedication to the public. (c) But where a canal company were required to make and maintain bridges over a canal for the use of the owners and occupiers of adjoining lands, and also where the canal was carried across any highway, bridleway or footpath; and in 1804 the company erected a swivel bridge at a spot where there was a public bridleway and footway, which bridge, as a carriage-way, was intended to be for the exclusive accommodation of the tenants of an adjoining estate. From 1810 to 1822 the public occasionally used the bridge with carriages. In 1822 a church was built near to the canal, streets were formed, and the neighbourhood became very populous. From 1822 to 1832 the bridge was used by the public as a carriage-way, without interruption. In 1832 the company began to exact a toll from persons not tenants of the adjoining estate crossing the bridge with carriages, and in 1834 they removed the swivel bridge, and built a stone bridge in its stead. It was held that the evidence warranted the jury in finding that there had been a dedication. The fact of the public having the uninterrupted use of the way from 1822 to 1832 was a strong ground for inferring an intention on the part of the company to dedicate the way to the public. But if the matter rested on what took place since 1834, it could not be said that there had been a dedication to the public; but the previous period must be looked at, and if the public had acquired a right of way along the swivel bridge, the circumstance of the company erecting the stone bridge in its place could not have the effect of destroying that right. (d) Upon an indictment for encroaching upon a public highway, it appeared that in 1771, commissioners under an inclosure Act had been empowered to set out public and private roads, the former to be repaired by the township, the latter by such persons as the commissioners should direct. The public roads were to 'be and remain sixty feet in breadth between the fences.' The road in question was described in the award as a private road, and of the width of eight yards; but in fact a space of sixty feet was left between the fences till the time of the alleged encroachment. The centre of this space was commonly used by the public as a carriage-road, and had been repaired by the township for eighteen years before the encroachment. The space said to be encroached upon was at the side of this road, and there was a diversity of evidence as to the use made of this space by the public, and its condition since the time of the award. The commissioners, in their award, directed that the township should repair as well the public as the private ways. Parke, J., in summing up, observed that the commissioners had exceeded their authority in awarding that a private road should be repaired by the township; (e) but he left it to the jury to decide, whether the road, though originally meant to be a private one, had not subsequently been dedicated to the public, and they found a verdict of guilty, and it was held, that the case was for the jury, and that they had found a proper verdict. It seems that there may be a partial dedication of a way, although doubts have been entertained upon the subject. Where the owner of an estate permitted the public to use a road for several years for all purposes except that of carrying coals, Bayley and Holroyd, J.J., thought there might be such a partial dedication. (g) So where an indictment for nonrepair of a bridge used 'at all such times as and when it has been or is dangerous to pass through the river by the side of the bridge,' was objected to because it did not show the bridge to be a public bridge, but only a bridge to be used on particular occasions, which could not be if it were a public highway, for according to the language of Heath, J., in Roberts v. Karr, (h) there could not be a partial dedication to the public; Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, though it must be an absolute dedication to the public, still it might be definite as to time, and the Court overruled the objection. (i)

Where there has been a compulsory obligation to permit a qualified passage.

There may be a partial dedication.

The correct distinction in cases of this kind appears to be that there may be a dedication of a way to the public for a limited purpose, as for a footway, horseway, or driftway; but there cannot be a dedication to a limited part of the public, as to the inhabitants of a parish and persons resorting to their houses. (k) Thus there may be a dedication of a highway, subject to a partial interruption during the continuance of a fair or market for a certain limited and not unreasonable time. (l) So where in front of a line of houses there was a footway; then a space thirty-three feet wide between the footway and a carriage-way, and the occupiers of the houses had always made use of so much of the intermediate space as was opposite to their respective houses, in such manner as suited their trades or occupations; but the public had at all times passed over the intermediate space as of right subject to such use of it by the occupiers; the Court of Queen's Bench seem to have been of opinion that this was a dedication to the public, subject to such use by the occupiers. (m) So where there had been a public highway over a quay in front of certain houses, and as far as living memory went there had been a user by the occupiers thereof to deposit anchors and other incumbrances thereon, the Court of Exchequer thought that in point of law a dedication might have been made subject to such user. (n)

What is the correct distinction as to the dedication of a way.

A highway may be dedicated with obstructions or impediments which, if made in an existing highway, would be a nuisance. Thus where a cellar had an opening into a footway, which was open during the day, but shut at night with a flap which slightly projected above the footway, and this state of things had existed as far as living memory went, it was held that the jury ought to draw the conclusion that it had existed as long as the footway, and that the dedication of the way to the public was with the reservation of the flap being continued there, and accepted by them subject to the inconvenience arising from it: and that such a dedication might lawfully be made, and consequently that the flap was no nuisance, though it would have been otherwise if it had been placed in an existing footway. (o)

subject to a private way.

Where a private right of way already exists, the owner of the land over which it runs can only dedicate that land to the public subject to such private right; for he can give nothing but what he himself has, i.e., a right of user not inconsistent with the private easement; (p) and the acquiring a right of way by the public does not destroy a previously existing private right of way over the same line. (q)

Dedication for a limited time.

But there can be no dedication of a way by an individual to the public for a limited time, whether certain or uncertain, and if dedicated at all by an individual, it must be dedicated in perpetuity. (r)

Roads made public by Acts of Parliament, continue such during the existence of

Public roads are frequently created by Acts of Parliament, but in these cases the road will only continue to be a public road so long as the Act continues in force, and the performance of statute duty upon the road during the continuance of the Act is no adoption of the road so as to render the parish liable to repair it after the Act has expired. A road was made by the trustees appointed under the 45 Geo. 3, c. 7, which was to continue in force for twenty-one years, and from thence to the end of the then next session of Parliament, and which required the inhabitants to do statute duty upon the road: it was held that when the Act ceased to be in operation, the road made pursuant to its provisions was no longer a public road, and as, during the time the Act continued in force, the several parishes through which the road passed were compelled by the Act to do statute duty, there was no adoption of the road by these parishes during that period. As soon as the Act expired or was repealed, the several parishes, through which the road passed, could only be liable to repair by reason of the common law obligation. Now a road becomes public by reason of a dedication of the right of passage to the public by the owner of the soil, and of an acceptance of the right by the public or the parish; and in this case the facts did not furnish any ground for presuming an adoption by the public. J.*, and Byles, J., held that way, it appeared that the road was made under a turnpike Act, which was to continue in force for twenty-one years, and had been kept in force by subsequent Acts till the finding of the indictment. It was opened in 1850 for general traffic, a stage-coach had run along it, and it had been used by carts and carriages. It was proposed to prove in defence that the trustees had never put the road in good repair, and that it had never been properly fenced or finished so as to fulfil the requisitions of the Act; but as it had been so far completed as to have been used along the whole line for several years, Patteson, J., rejected the evidence as tending to prove what was immaterial. It was contended, after a verdict of guilty, that the township was not liable to repair a temporary turnpike road; that the way was improperly described, as it was not described as a way for a limited time, and that the evidence was improperly rejected, as unless the road had been completed by the trustees, the township had not become liable to repair. But it was held that this was a common Queen's highway at the time the bill was found, and that the township was liable to repair it, at least as long as the Act continued in force, and that there was no misdescription, and that after the road had been opened and used for so many years, it was much too late to raise any objection to its not having been fully completed. (t) Where a road was made by turnpike trustees under a temporary Act which expired in 1848, but the whole line authorized by the Act had never been completed: for twenty-eight years it had been used by the public, and rates had been made, during that time, at the parish meetings, for the repair of the road, and the road had on many occasions been repaired, and the surveyor had been paid for such repairs, but during such time portions of the road were frequently not kept in sufficient repair, and in one part there was a hole a yard deep made by persons employed to repair the road in order to obtain materials, but vehicles could pass between that and the hedge, and the parish had not attempted to fill it up. Two or three bars or chains were put up shortly after the making of the road, and toll demanded and sometimes refused; but the chain and bars had been removed for more than twelve years. On an appeal against a conviction in 1857 for obstructing this road, the sessions confirmed the conviction, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, whether there was evidence that the said road ever became a highway compulsorily repairable by the parish; and that Court held that there was such evidence, and that, though the fact that the road was originally made under the turnpike Act, might explain away such evidence in fact, it did not conclusively rebut it in law. (u)

Where an ancient highway is turned into a turnpike road the imposition of tolls does not prevent its continuing to be repairable by the parish. (v)

Where by an Act of Parliament trustees are authorized to make a road from one point to another, the making of the entire road is a condition precedent to any part becoming a highway repairable by the public. Trustees, being empowered to make a turnpike road to extend twelve miles in length, completed only eleven miles and a half of the road, to a point where the new road intersected another public road, leaving half a mile at the extremity of the intended road unmade: it was held that the trustees not having completed the road which the Act authorized them to make, the burden of repairing it could not be thrown on the public. (w) And in a subsequent case the same decision was made, although the part had been made from twenty to thirty years, and repaired from time to time by the public. (x) And although in one case (y) where trustees were authorized to make a turnpike road and several branch roads from it, two learned judges expressed an opinion that each road, as soon as it was completed, and certified by two justices so to be, became a public highway, because the Act required the justices to certify as to each road respectively; yet it has since been held in a similar case (z) that not only the principal road but all the branch roads must be completed before the public can be liable to repair any part. Acts of this kind are bargains made on behalf of the public, not on the great line of road merely, but on every part of the roads, for the branches may have been the consideration upon which consent was given to the making of the main road.

Where a highway has once existed no interruption or cesser of user will prevent its continuance as a highway. Where a highway was proved to have existed for forty years before 1827, and then to have been interrupted for more than twenty years, it was contended that such an interruption acquiesced in by the public was sufficient in law to exclude such right of way on behalf of the public; but it was held that the fact that a person had for more than twenty years prevented the public from doing what they had done before for forty years, did not destroy the right. An interruption for such a period was evidence that no right ever existed, but it might be met by counter evidence. (a)

By the common law an ancient highway cannot be changed without the King's license first obtained upon a writ of ad quod damnum, and an inquisition thereon found that such a change will not be prejudicial to the public: and it is said that if one change a highway without such authority, he may stop the new way whenever he pleases; and it seems that the King's subjects have not such an interest in such new way as will make good a general justification of their going in it as in a common highway; but that in an action of trespass, brought by the owner of the land, against those who shall go over it, they ought to show specially, by way of excuse, how the old way was obstructed, and the new one set out. And it is also said, that the inhabitants are not bound to keep watch in such new way, or to make amends for a robbery therein committed, or to repair it. (b)

It is certain that a highway may be changed by the act of God; and therefore it has been holden that if a water, which has been an ancient highway, by degrees change its course, and go over different ground from that whereon it used to run, yet the highway continues in the new channel as it previously was in the old. (c) But it may well be doubted whether this position can be applied to roads, and it seems clearly inapplicable to a case where a public road is washed away by the sea. An indictment alleged that a certain part of a public highway, which had existed from time immemorial, was out of repair, and that the defendant was liable to repair it by reason of the tenure of his lands, and it was found by a special verdict that the sea had from time to time made incroachments upon the said lands, and carried away the soil and earth of the same, so that part of the space occupied by the said lands was occupied by the sea; and that there was an ancient highway as stated in the indictment, part whereof passed over the said lands, and that the incroachments of the sea had from time to time extended unto and over the said ancient highway, so that a portion of the said highway was covered by the sea and impassable, wherefore those, whose estate the defendant had, had, from time to time, gradually removed the same highway, and appropriated other parts of the said land for the site thereof, so that the public had had the uninterrupted use of a road for the purposes of the said highway, and that the same road had always been repaired by the defendant and those whose estate he had in lieu of so much of the ancient highway, and that the sea had made an incroachment in the month of March last, upon the part of the highway mentioned in the indictment; and carried away large quantities of the soil thereof, and that the highway was thereby rendered impassable. And it was held by the Court of Queen's Bench, that the defendant was entitled to be acquitted. (d) So where an indictment described a road as leading from a street to the German Ocean, and alleged that part of it was in great decay for want of due reparation, and it appeared that the road had formerly sloped gradually down towards the sea, but had been washed away from time to time by the incroachments of the sea, and at the time when the indictment was preferred the termination of the road had become a perpendicular cliff twenty feet high, which rendered it impossible for any cart or carriage to get down to the beach, but the surface of the existing road was in good repair up to where the same had been swept away by the destruction of the cliff; it was held that there did not exist any legal obligation upon the parish to provide an available carriage-road down to the beach. The indictment alleged that there was a highway, and that it was out of repair; but it is found that that part of the road alleged to be out of repair has been washed away by the sea, so that the subject of repair is not in existence; and in order to create an obligation to repair, there must be something in existence capable of being repaired. it appeared that the highway alleged to be out of repair had passed along the top of a quay, which was a thick wall of solid masonry of considerable height, and the surface of it was composed of large pieces of granite mortared together, and had been used by persons going on foot and on horseback and with small carts used by fisherman, and two or three years before the sea had washed away a considerable portion of the quay leaving a gap, which completely broke off the communication. Maule, J., held that the defendants were entitled to be acquitted. Whatever might be the duty of the parish as to the road whilst the quay existed, they were not defaulters on this evidence. The interruption of the passage was not from the want of repair, but from the sea having washed away the wall, and there was no longer anything for them to repair. (f)

the 5 & 6 Will.
4, c. 50, s. 82.

By the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 80, the surveyor shall make every public cartway, leading to any market town, twenty feet wide at the least, and every public horseway eight feet wide at the least, and every public footway by the side of any carriage-way three feet at the least, if the ground between the fences inclosing the same will admit thereof. (g) And by sec. 82, where it shall appear, upon the view of two justices, that any highway is not of sufficient breadth, and may be widened and enlarged, the said justices shall order such highway to be widened and enlarged in such manner as they shall think fit, so that the said highway, when enlarged and diverted, shall not exceed thirty feet in breadth; and that neither of the said powers do extend to pull down any house or building, or to take away the ground of any garden, lawn, yard, court, park, paddock, planted walk, plantation, or avenue to any house or any inclosed ground set apart for building ground, or as a nursery for trees. The statute then proceeds to empower the surveyor to agree with the owners of the ground wanted for such purposes for their recompense; and provides, that if they cannot agree, the same may be assessed by a jury at the quarter sessions; and, after directing the proceedings in such event, it enacts that, 'upon payment or tender of the money so to be awarded and assessed, to the person, body politic or corporate, entitled to receive the same, or leaving it in the hands of the clerk of the peace of such limit, in case such person, &c., cannot be found, or shall refuse to accept the same, for the use of the owner of or others interested in the said ground, the interest of the said person, &c., in the said ground shall be for ever divested out of them; and the said ground, after such agreement or verdict as aforesaid, shall be esteemed and taken to be a public highway, to all intents and purposes whatsoever.' Proceedings for diverting, &c., certain highways, and

(i) This provision seems to have been introduced to get rid of the doubts entertained in Rex v. Winter, 8 B. & C. 785, as to whether justices could divert a road for carriages and continue it for foot passengers. An order for stopping up half the breadth of a highway under the 55 Geo. 3, c. 68, was bad, although the other half was not within the division of the justices who made the order. Rex v. Milverton, 5 A. & E. 841; 1 N. & P. 179.

(k) This seems virtually to do away with the writ of ad quod damnum, as the clause is imperative on the party desiring to stop up a highway to proceed under this section. C. S. G.

(l) Actual inspection being the foundation of the jurisdiction of the justices, an order must have distinctly stated that the justices acted upon view. An order stating the view thus, 'we having upon view found,' Rex v. Justices of Cambridgeshire, 4 A. & E. 111, 5 N. & M. 440; or 'we having upon view found, and it appearing to us,' Rex v. Milverton, 5 A. & E. 841, 1 N. & P. 179, was good; but an order thus, 'we having particularly viewed the public roads and footway hereinafter described, and we not being interested in the repair of the said roads and footway, and being satisfied that the highways,' &c., was bad, because the clause containing the original and material allegation of a 'view' was separated in a very marked manner from that wherein the satisfaction of the justices, and the grounds of it were contained; and the justices might, consistently with a reasonable construction of the order, have been influenced by other proof than the view. Rex v. Marquis of Downshire, 4 A. & E. 698; 6 N. & M. 92. So an order, 'we having upon view found, or it appearing unto us,' was bad. Rex v. Justices of Worcestershire, 8 B. & C. 244; and see Rex v. Justices of Kent, 10 B. & C. 477; Reg. v. Jones, 12 A. & E. 684; Reg. v. Newmarket R. Co. 15 Q. B. 702, that the order must have shown, on the face of it, that the justices had viewed the new line of road. The view by justices under the 55 Geo. 3, c. 68, s. 2, was not sufficient, unless it was a joint view, and unless the finding that the way was unnecessary was the result of that view: but it was held to be no objection that previously to their view the road had been stopped up de facto by the owner of the adjoining land without authority, as they might properly state in their order that they had viewed the old road if they had viewed the ground over which the right of way was. Rex v. Justices of Cambridgeshire, 4 A. & E. 111; 5 N. & M. 440. Where a person, over whose land a highway led, opened another road over his own land, between the same points, which the public used, and they ceased using the former road, it was held that nine years afterwards an order for stopping up the old road as unnecessary might be made under the 55 Geo. 3, c. 68, and that it was not necessary to proceed as in case of diverting a highway under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 16, ibid.

(q) The notice of appeal must state that the party is injured or aggrieved. Rex v. Justices of Essex, 5 B. & C. 431. *Rex v. It is enough, however, to state that the appellant and his tenants, occupiers of a farm and lands near the said way, and who have heretofore used and have a right to use it, and also other persons, and the public will be put to great inconvenience. Rex v. Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 4 B. & Ad. 685; 1 N. & M. 426. So it is sufficient to state that the appellants are aggrieved by being compelled to go a greater distance to the next market town from their residence, than they would have gone if the road intended to be stopped up were put and kept in repair; and if the notice states that they are aggrieved, it need not add that they are aggrieved by the order. Rex v. Adey, 4 N. & M. 365.

(r) The notice must be ten days before the sessions next after the expiration of four weeks from the lodging of the certificate with the clerk of the peace. Reg. v. Lancashire, 8 E. & B. 563. The days are to be calculated one day inclusive, the other exclusive, notwithstanding a rule of the sessions requiring a different computation, Rex v. Justices of West Riding of York, 4 B. & Ad. 685; 1 N. & M. 426. Rex v. Justices of Cumberland, 4 N. & M. 378; 2 A. & E. 463.

provided that in all cases where the said surveyor shall have been directed by the inhabitants in vestry assembled to apply to such justices as aforesaid, then the said surveyor shall not be required to deliver a copy of such notice to any party; provided also, that it shall not be lawful for the appellant to be heard in support of such appeal unless such notice and statement shall have been so given as aforesaid, nor on the hearing of such appeal to go into or give evidence of any other grounds of appeal than those set forth in such statement as aforesaid.'

In case of appeal, jury at sessions to determine whether new highway is nearer, &c.

Sec. 89. 'In case of such appeal the justices at the said quarter sessions shall, for the purpose of determining whether the proposed new highway is nearer or more commodious to the public, or whether the public highway so intended to be stopped up, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, is unnecessary, or whether the said party appealing would be injured or aggrieved, impanel a jury of twelve disinterested men out of the persons returned to serve as jurymen at such quarter sessions: and if, after hearing the evidence produced before them, the said jury shall return a verdict that the proposed new highway is nearer or more commodious to the public, or that the public highway so intended to be stopped up, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, is unnecessary, or that the party appealing would not be injured or aggrieved, then the said court of quarter sessions shall dismiss such appeal, and make the order herein mentioned for diverting and turning and stopping up such highway either entirely or subject as aforesaid, or for diverting, turning, and stopping up of such old highway, and purchasing the ground and soil for such new highway, or for stopping up such unnecessary highway either entirely or subject as aforesaid; but if the said jury shall return a verdict that the proposed new highway is not nearer or not more commodious to the public (s) or that the highway so intended to be stopped up, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, is not unnecessary, or that the party appealing would be injured or aggrieved, then the said court of quarter sessions shall allow such appeal, and shall not make such order as aforesaid.' (s) Where the jury found that the new line was 'not nearer but more commodious,' it was held no order could be made for diverting the road. Reg. v. Shiles, 1 Q. B. 919. But this case was all but overruled in Reg. v. Wright, 8 Law T. 455.

(t) Sec. 90. 'The court of quarter sessions is hereby authorized and required to award to the party giving or receiving notice of appeal such costs and expenses as shall be incurred in prosecuting or resisting such appeal, whether the same shall be tried or not, and such costs and expenses shall be paid by the surveyor or other party as aforesaid at whose instance the notice for diverting and turning or stopping up the highway, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, shall have been given, and in case the said surveyor or other party as aforesaid shall not appear in support thereof, the said court of quarter sessions shall award the costs of the appellant to be paid by such surveyor or other party as aforesaid, and such costs shall be recoverable in the same manner as any penalties or forfeitures are recoverable under this Act.' See Reg. v. W. R. of Yorkshire, 2 B. & S. 811.

(u) In Rex v. Justices of Worcestershire, 2 B. & A. 228, it was held that the sessions had a right to inquire whether the order, though there was no appeal, was made by proper authority before they confirmed it. And it is the duty of the sessions to see that the certificate and proof required by the Act are regular, though there is no appeal, before they make an order under this section. *Reg. v. Sec. 92. 'In every case in which a highway shall have been turned or diverted under the provisions of this Act, the parish or other party which was liable to the repair of the old highway shall be liable to the repair of the new highway, without any reference whatever to its parochial locality.'

Sec. 93. 'The powers and provisions in this Act contained with respect to the widening and enlarging, diverting, turning, or stopping up any highway shall be applicable to all highways which any person, bodies politic or corporate, is or are bound to repair by reason of any grant, tenure, limitation, or appointment of any charitable gift, or otherwise howsoever; and that when such last-mentioned highways are so widened or enlarged, turned or diverted, the same shall and may, by an order of the justices at a special sessions for the highways, be placed under the control and care of the surveyor of the parish in which such highways may be situate, and shall be from time to time thereafter repaired and kept in repair by the said parish: provided also, that the said highways so widened, enlarged, diverted, or turned, shall be viewed by two justices of the peace, who shall make a report way under the 55 Geo. 3, c. 68, s. 2, must have distinctly stated in what parish or place the footway was situate. Rex v. Kenyon, 6 B. & C. 640. Where a road was diverted, the order must have shown on the face of it that the public had the same permanent right over the new line as they had along the old line: where, therefore, the new line passed partly over a road described in the order as a new turnpike road, it was held that as it might have been made a turnpike road only for a limited period, and if so, would subsist as a public road for that period only (see ante, p. 470), the order was bad; and if a permanent right was given to the public under the Turnpike Act, that ought to have been shown by the order. Rex v. Winter, 8 B. & C. 785. An order referring to a plan annexed to the order for the description of the road to be diverted was good; but a notice published pursuant to the 55 Geo. 3, c. 68, s. 2, merely describing the road by termini, and the part to be stopped up as so many yards of such road, was held bad. Rex v. Horner, 2 B. & Ad. 150. If an order for stopping a highway were properly made and enrolled, under 55 Geo. 3, c. 68, it was unnecessary to render it effectual that an actual stoppage of the road should have taken place. Rex v. Milverton, 5 A. & E. 841; 1 N. & P. 179. A footway might be ordered to be stopped without being ordered to be sold. Rex v. Glover, 1 B. & Ad. 482. It seems to have been thought that the justices had only jurisdiction over the roads within the division of the county for which they acted, under the 55 Geo. 3, c. 68. Rex v. Milverton, 5 A. & E. 841; 1 N. & P. 179.

thereof to the justices at a special sessions for the highways, and such last-mentioned justices shall, by an order under their hands, fix the proportionate sum which shall be annually paid, or shall fix a certain sum to be paid, by such person, bodies politic or corporate, his or their heirs, successors, or assigns, to the said surveyors of the parish, in lieu of thereafter repairing the said part of the said old highway, and the order of the said last-mentioned justices shall be and continue binding on all such persons, bodies politic or corporate, their heirs, successors, or assigns, and in default of payment thereof the said surveyor shall proceed for the recovery of the same in the manner as any penalties and forfeitures are recoverable under this Act.⁷

Where boundaries of parishes are in the middle of a highway, justices may divide the highway by a transverse line.

It frequently happened that the boundaries of parishes passed through the middle of a highway, one side of the highway being situated in one parish, and the other side of the way being situated in another parish, whereby great inconveniences arose to the parishes in settling the time and manner of repairing such highway; and it was therefore provided by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 58, that the justices, at a special sessions for the highways, upon application by the surveyor, may divide the whole of any such common highway, by a transverse line crossing it, into two equal parts, or into two such unequal parts and proportions as in consideration of the soil, waters, floods, the inequality of such highway, or any other circumstances, they think just. (w)

Highways may be changed, &c., by particular Acts of Parliament.

Besides the methods which have been already mentioned, roads are sometimes changed or stopped, or new ones created by turnpike Acts, inclosure Acts, or other Acts of Parliament, containing specific enactments for such purposes; but such new roads may or may not be public, according to the provisions of the particular Acts; and we have seen that where a road was set out by commissioners under an inclosure Act, the number of persons using or repairing it would not make it a public way, it not being common to all the King's subjects. (x)

The commissioners appointed under local inclosure Acts have power to stop up and divert public ways over lands to be inclosed by the 41 Geo. 3, c. 109, s. 8; but that section contains a proviso, that where such commissioners have power, under any inclosure Act, to stop up any old road leading through old inclosures, they shall not exercise that power without the concurrence of two justices; it follows as a necessary consequence from the proviso taken with the rest of the clause, that if no such power is given to commissioners by the particular inclosure Act, it cannot exist at all. Where, therefore, an Act gave the commissioners no power to stop up roads passing through old inclosures, and they did not mention the way in question, which ran over some old inclosures and across a few yards of waste, which they allotted: it was held that the way existed as it did before the inclosure Act. (y)

Under the 41 Geo. 3, c. 109, s. 8, the commissioners are authorized to stop up or divert footways as well as carriage-roads; and the proviso at the end of the section is not confined to carriage

(w) The Act sets forth particularly the proceedings to be had for the purpose of such division; and afterwards enacts as to the liabilities of the parishes respectively to repair their portions after such division; see post, p. 498.

roads, but extends to every species of way; and, therefore, where the commissioners were empowered by a local inclosure Act to stop up all ways passing over the lands to be inclosed, as well as ways passing through old inclosures in the parish, it was held that in order effectually to stop up a public footway passing partly over the lands to be inclosed and partly over an old inclosure, it was necessary for them to have the concurrence and order of two justices, and no such order or concurrence having been obtained, it was held that a footway which the commissioners ordered to be stopped up had not been effectually stopped, but continued a public footway. (z)

Where an inclosure Act provided that all ways not set out by the commissioners should be extinguished, and also authorized the stopping up of roads through old inclosures, provided that no roads should be stopped up without the order of two justices, and a road through old inclosures opened upon the waste, and at such opening joined another road, which formed a continuation of the first road, and ran entirely over waste land; and no valid order was obtained for stopping up the road, which ran through the old inclosures, and the road over the waste land was not set out or continued by the commissioners: it was held that this omission to set out or continue the road, did not extinguish the road through the old inclosures, and create a consequent stoppage of the road over the waste, but that, on the contrary, the road through the old inclosures remaining open for want of an order of justices, as a consequence the road over the waste remained open also. (a)

Upon an indictment against the township of Hatfield for non-repair of a highway, it appeared that the road was an ancient highway which passed over part of a common then within Hatfield, and that by an inclosure Act (51 Geo. 3, c. 30) for inclosing Hatfield and other townships, it was directed that the allotments in respect of certain messuages should be part of the townships within which the messuages were situate, and the commissioners were to make such orders as they should think proper concerning all public roads, 'in what township and place the same are respectively situate,' and by whom they ought to be repaired. The commissioners by their award directed there should be the road in question, and new allotments on each side of it were declared to be in other townships than Hatfield, but it was not declared in what township the road was situate, or by whom it was to be repaired. The prescriptive liability set forth in the indictment was proved, but no certificate of justices was produced. It was held that the road continued in Hatfield, but that Hatfield could not be indicted for not repairing it for want of a certificate of justices under the 41 Geo. 3, c. 109, s. 9, declaring it to be fully completed. (b)

Upon an indictment for the nonrepair of an ancient bridleway, it appeared that there had been such an ancient way leading through old inclosures into and across a common, which in parts was so narrow that the bridleway might be described as passing along a broad lane; in other parts the common opened into a broad field, across which persons using the way rode much as they pleased, so that in those parts there was no definite track. Certain commissioners under an Act, 54 Geo. 3, c. 160, which incorporated the 41 Geo. 3, c. 109, were authorized 'to stop up, divert, turn, or in any other way alter' any public ways over the common or old inclosures with the concurrence of two justices, and to set out new ways, which, when certified by two justices to be complete, were to be repaired by the parish, and they directed the common to be inclosed, and made no alteration in the bridle-way between the old inclosures; but ordered that across the common there should be set out a road thirty feet wide as a 'public bridle-road' and as a 'private carriage-road' for certain persons, and directed that the road should be repaired by those persons. The road was accordingly set out, and its termini were the same as those of the old bridleway, but it did not precisely follow the track over which the public were anciently accustomed to ride. No certificate or order of justices was proved: and it was held that the cases cited(c) related to roads stopped or diverted by the commissioners or left unnoticed in their award, and so impliedly stopped or diverted; but in this case there had been no stopping or diverting of the old road; that the road set out was in effect the same road, and that the parish was bound to do such repairs as were requisite to maintain the road as a public bridle-road. (d)

Where a road is continued under an award of commissioners of inclosure, it must be declared, under sec. 9 of 41 Geo. 3, c. 109, by justices, to be fully completed before the inhabitants of the district can be indicted for not repairing it.

Upon an indictment against a parish for the nonrepair of a highway it appeared that the road indicted was an ancient highway within the parish. In 1840 the parish was inclosed under an Act which incorporated the General Inclosure Act, 41 Geo. 3, c. 109. The award was made in June 1840, and under the heading of 'public carriage-roads and highways' described the road indicted as 'one public carriage-road and highway of the width of thirty feet.' The commissioners had before the award made some alteration in the original road by straightening and widening it; but the whole of the original road was comprehended in the road set out in the award. It was admitted by the defendants that the road indicted was a public road, and that the parish had repaired it both before and after the award; but no steps had been taken by the commissioners for putting it into complete repair, and there never was any declaration by any justices at special sessions that the road had been fully formed, completed and repaired; and no proceedings had been taken under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 23. The road passed through allotable land on both sides, except that a small portion on one side was an old inclosure. It was objected that the proviso in sec. 9 of the 41 Geo. 3, c. 109, applied to roads continued by an award as well as to roads made under it; and that as the road had not been declared by any justices at special sessions to be formed, completed and repaired, the parish were not chargeable with the nonrepair; and, upon a case reserved, after a verdict of guilty, the conviction was held wrong. (e)

Where an inclosure Act authorized commissioners to stop up any old road leading between or over certain old inclosures, provided there was an order of two justices, and the award in 1814 in pursuance of the powers of the Act and 'by the concurrence and order of' two justices stopped up a public footpath; but no order of justices could be found; the footpath had been stopped up in pursuance of the award, and the site of it obliterated, and a private carriage-way had been made on the site of it, and persons prevented passing along it, and one person taken before a magistrate for so doing; and it was held that there was sufficient primâ facie evidence of the footway having been properly stopped; for the award must be taken to have been rightly made, unless there were some inference to the contrary from subsequent enjoyment inconsistent with it. (f)

Order of justices may be presumed.

Where an inclosure Act incorporated the 41 Geo. 3, c. 109, and authorized commissioners to stop up old roads, subject to the concurrence of two justices, and the commons were allotted in 1819, when a gate which had since been kept locked was put up across an old highway, but the road had since been used by foot passengers occasionally, and the award in 1830 set out new roads and directed the old roads to be stopped up, and a certificate of two justices that the new roads had been completed, under the 41 Geo. 3, c. 109, s. 9, was proved; but no order of justices for stopping the old road was proved; it was held that as there had been an inclosure of the road for about twenty-eight years, it was sufficient to warrant the Court, standing in the place of a jury, in presuming that everything was rightly done, and that an order of justices had been obtained, and that the user by foot passengers was not sufficient to rebut that presumption. (g)

Upon an indictment against the township of Gate Fulford for the nonrepair of a highway, which it was alleged to be liable to repair by virtue of an inclosure Act and award, it appeared that Gate Fulford and Water Fulford were townships in the parish of Fulford, and the inclosure Act directed commissioners to allot certain lands in the manor of Fulford which (it was contended) were shown by the context to be all in the township of Gate Fulford, and to set out public and private roads in such lands, and the public roads so set out were to be repaired by the township of Gate Fulford. The award set out some roads, which it termed public highways and roads; some which it termed public carriage-roads, and others which it termed private carriage-roads: it then set out the road in question, which it termed simply a 'carriage-road,' and directed that it should be repaired by 'the township of Fulford aforesaid,' without specifying which township was meant. Another road also termed simply a 'carriage-road' appeared to be set out as a private road. It was held that it sufficiently appeared that the road in question was made a public road. The road in question ran through what was now understood to be the township of Water Fulford; the township of Gate Fulford had, however, on many occasions repaired the road, but had also repaired roads in the township which were not public roads: it was held that, assuming the commissioners had power only to award as to lands in Gate Fulford, the Court would presume that the lands, on which the road was made, lay at the time of the award in Gate Fulford. Towing-path under the circumstances held not to be affected by an Act of Parliament.

A statute authorizing the making a new course for a navigable river, and turning the old part into a floating harbour, will not, without words for the purpose, put an end to a public towing-path upon that part; but such towing-path will be liable to be used as such for the purposes of the harbour; and it will make no difference though the river was a tide river, and at low water admitted of no navigation. By the 43 Geo. 3, power was given to carry part of the Bristol river along a new course, and to convert the old part into a floating harbour. There had immemorially been a towing-path on the north side, and whether that continued a public towing-path along the side of the floating harbour was the question. It was urged that it did not, because this was a tide river, not navigable at low water; and the floating harbour would make it usable at all times, and therefore increase the burthen on the land. But, after taking time to consider, the Court held, that as there were no words in the Act to annihilate the right of the public, that right would continue notwithstanding the improved state of the water within the bank; that such water being still applied to navigation purposes, for the use of the public, was still in a state to derive the benefit from the path for which the path had first been given to the public: and judgment was given for the King. (i)

And in some instances by private individuals.

In some instances a highway may, it seems, be in some measure changed or confined to a particular course by a private individual; as, 'where it lies over an open field, and the owner of the field turns it to another part of the field for his own convenience, or incloses the field for his own benefit, leaving a sufficient way.' (h) But in such case, as the public had clearly a right before such alteration to go upon the adjacent ground when the way was out of repair, the owner of the field can only make the alteration subject to the onus of making a good and perfect way. (l)

(h) Reg. v. Gate Fulford, D. & B. C. C. 74. It was conceded that if any part of the road set out had been on land over which the commissioners had no jurisdiction, the award would have been bad as to the whole road.

(i) Rex v. Tippet, Mich. T. 1819, 3 B. & A. 192, and MS. Bayley, J. The indictment was for an obstruction of the public path.

(k) 3 Salk. 182. But in Rex v. Warde, Cro. Car. 266, to an information for obstructing a highway, the defendants pleaded that the way was so foul that passengers could not pass without danger, and that C. Sands being seised in fee laid out a more commodious way in his land adjoining the highway; and the plea was held bad, because it did not appear by what authority he did it; for it is but at his pleasure, and he may stop it when he will, and the subjects have not such interest therein that they may justify going there, nor is any one bound to repair it. And in Rex v. Flecknow, 1 Burr. 465, Lord Mansfield said, 'An owner of land over which there is an open road may inclose it by his own authority, or alter it under a proper authority, and by a legal course;' that is by a writ of ad quod damnum (now abolished), as is stated immediately afterwards.

(l) 3 Salk. 182. And see the cases collected in Rex v. Stoughton, 2 Saund. 160, a, note (12). And see also post, as to the repair of highways.

Having thus inquired concerning the different sorts of highways, and the methods by which they may be changed, widened, or stopped up, we may now consider of nuisances to highways, by obstructions.

There is no doubt but that all injuries whatsoever to a highway, as by digging a ditch, or making a hedge across it, or laying logs of timber in it, or ploughing it up, (m) or by doing any other act which will render it less commodious to the King's subjects, are public nuisances at common law. (n) And if the tenant of the land plough the soil, over which another has a way, this is a nuisance to the way, for it is not so easy to him as it was before. (o) If a man with a cart use a common pack and prime way, so as to plough it up and render it less convenient for riders, that is indictable. (p) If there be a stile across a public footway of a certain height, and a man raises this stile to a greater height, it is a nuisance. (q) And it is clearly a nuisance at common law to erect a new gate in a highway, though it be not locked, and open and shut freely, because it interrupts the people in that free and open passage which they before enjoyed and were lawfully entitled to; but where such a gate has continued time out of mind, it shall be intended that it was set up at first by consent, on a composition with the owner of the land, on the laying out the road, in which case the people had never any right to a freer passage than what they continue to enjoy. (r)

It is a nuisance to suffer the highway to be incommoded by reason of the foulness of the adjoining ditches, or by boughs of trees hanging over it, &c.; and an occupier, as such, though at will only, is indictable for suffering a house standing upon the highway to be ruinous; and it is said that the owner of land next adjoining to the highway ought of common right to scour his ditches; but that the owner of land, next adjoining to such land, is not bound by the common law so to do, without a special prescription: (s) and it is also said that the owner of trees hanging over a highway, to the annoyance of travellers, is bound by the common law to lop them; and that any other person may lop them, so far as to avoid the nuisance. (t) The general highway Act also relates to offences of this description, imposing pecuniary penalties upon persons obstructing highways by means of trees or hedges; and penalties are also imposed upon persons laying stones, timber, or other matter, or leaving any carriage, so as to obstruct the passage of any highway; and also upon persons encroaching upon them. (u) Provision is also made for the punishment, by similar penalties, of drivers of carriages who may create annoyances in the public ways by their misconduct. (v) And with the view of preventing turnpike roads from being destroyed by the narrowness of the wheels of the carriages travelling thereon, and by the excessive burdens which might be carried in them, it is enacted, that if the tire of the wheels of any waggon, &c., shall deviate more than half an inch from a specified breadth, and shall be drawn on any turnpike road, the owner shall forfeit five pounds, and the driver forty shillings, for every such offence. (w) With respect to turnpike roads, similar provisions are contained in the general turnpike Acts, 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, and 4 Geo. 4, c. 95.

It has been held, that if a carrier carries an unreasonable weight, with an unusual number of horses, it is a nuisance to the highway, by the common law. (x) And upon an information for this offence, it was adjudged, though it was stated that the carrier went 'with an unusual number of horses,' without setting forth what number, yet the information was good, because it was the excessive weight which he carried that made the nuisance. (y)

Every unauthorized obstruction of a highway, to the annoyance of the King's subjects, is an indictable offence.

It appears to have been holden, that an indictment will not lie for setting a person on the footway in a street to distribute handbills, whereby the footway was impeded and obstructed; (z) nor for throwing down skins into a public way by which a personal injury is accidentally occasioned; (a) but acts of this kind, if improperly performed, might possibly be deemed nuisances, as it seems now to be well established that every unauthorized obstruction of a highway, to the annoyance of the King's subjects, is an indictable offence. (b) Thus, where a waggoner occupied one side of a public street in the city of Exeter, before his warehouses, in loading and unloading his waggons, for several hours at a time, both day and night, and had one waggon at least usually standing before his warehouses, so that no carriage could pass on that side of the street, and sometimes even foot passengers were incommoded by cumbrous goods lying on the ground on the same side, ready for loading, he was held to be indictable for a public nuisance, although it appeared that sufficient space was left for two carriages to have passed on the opposite side of the street. (c) Upon the same principle it has been held to be an indictable offence for stage-coaches to stand plying for passengers in the public streets; and Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, 'A stage-coach may set down or take up passengers in the street, this being necessary for public convenience; but it must be done in a reasonable time; and private premises must be procured for the coach to stop in during the interval between the end of one journey and the commencement of another.' (d) In the same case his lordship intimated that there could be no doubt but that, if coaches, on the occasion of a rout, should wait an unreasonable length of time in a public street, and obstruct the transit of his Majesty's subjects wishing to pass through it in carriages or on foot, the persons who might cause and permit such coaches so to wait would be guilty of a nuisance. (e)

So it is indictable for a party to exhibit at the windows of his shop, in a public street, effigies, and thereby attract a crowd to look at them, which causes the footway to be obstructed so that the public cannot pass as they ought to do, and that it is not at all essential that the effigies should be libellous; for the gravamen of the charge is the causing the footway to be obstructed, and it seems to be immaterial whether the crowd consisted of idle, disorderly, and dissolute persons or not. (f)

Laying logs of timber in a highway has been already stated as one of the clear instances of nuisance. (g) And the party will not be excused by showing that he laid them only here and there, so that the people might have a passage through them by windings and turnings. (h) And though it is not a nuisance for an inhabitant of a town to unlade billets, &c., in the street before his house, by reason of the necessity of the case, yet he must do it promptly, and not suffer them to continue in the street an unreasonable length of time. (i) An obstruction to a public highway will not be excused on the plea of its being necessary for the carrying on of the party's business, though such obstruction be only occasional. The defendant, who was a timber merchant, occupied a small timber-yard close to a street, and, from the narrowness of the street and the construction of his own premises, he had, in several instances, necessarily deposited long sticks of timber in the street, and had them sawed into shorter pieces there before they could be carried into his yard: and it was contended on his behalf that he had a right so to do, as it was necessary to the carrying on of his business: and that it could not occasion more inconvenience to the public than draymen taking hogsheads of beer from their drays, and letting them down into the cellar of a publican. But Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, 'If an unreasonable time is occupied in the operation of delivering beer from a brewer's dray into the cellar of a publican, this is certainly a nuisance. A cart or waggon may be unloaded at a gateway; but this must be done with promptness. So as to the repairing of a house, the public must submit to the inconvenience occasioned necessarily in repairing the house; but if this inconvenience be prolonged for an unreasonable time, the public have a right to complain, and the party may be indicted for a nuisance. The rule of law upon this subject is much neglected, and great advantages would arise from a strict and steady application of it. I cannot bring myself to doubt of the guilt of the present defendant. He is not to eke out the inconvenience of his own premises by taking in the public highway into his timber-yard; and if the street be narrow, he must remove to a more commodious situation for carrying on his business.' (k) And in repairing or rebuilding a house, care must be taken that the encroachment on the highway be not unreasonable. The owner will himself be responsible for any excess, if committed by his servants; for, according to Eyre, C. J., 'suppose that the owner of a house, with a view to rebuild or repair, employ his own servants to erect a hoard in the street (which being for the benefit of the public, they may lawfully do), and they carry it out so far as to encroach unreasonably on the highway, it is clear that the owner would be guilty of a nuisance.' (l)

ways across a highway.

By an old Act, an ancient highway running over the land of Lord Stourton was made a turnpike, and afterwards collieries were worked on each side of the road, and railways made from time to time across the road for the conveyance of the coals from the collieries. In the 1 & 2 Geo. 4, a new Act passed for repairing the same road. One of the former railways was continued and new railways made afterwards across the road for the same purposes as before. By a clause in this Act a penalty, recoverable on summary conviction, was imposed on any person who made any railway across the road 'without the consent of the trustees or legal authority:' and it was held that the making and continuing of the railways was indictable, and that no inference could be drawn to the contrary from the facts of the case or the words of the last Act. To do the work complained of the turnpike road was dug into, but filled up again and restored to its former state, except that the railroad remained, forming a groove of wood, adapted to the wheels of the railway carriages, and so far sunk into the road that the highest part of it was on a level with the road; and, upon a special case empowering the Court to draw inferences as a jury, after a verdict of guilty, it was held that the Court could not pronounce the injury created by this work to be too slight and uncertain to be indictable. (p) along a road.

Upon an indictment for obstructing a highway, it appeared that the defendant laid down on a highway a double line of tramways, on which omnibuses plied for hire; and these tramways and omnibuses were dangerous and inconvenient to many of the public, as the wheels of vehicles skidded when crossing the tramways, and horses which put their feet upon them were frightened; a very large number of persons used the omnibuses as a means of transit, to the great saving of their time and money, and the vestrymen of the parish through which the tramways ran had sanctioned their being made; Erle, C. J., directed the jury that, if the tramways were a source of danger and inconvenience to a portion of the public, who had a right to use the highway, they were a nuisance without reference to their being for the general convenience; and it was held that this direction was right; for supposing it possible that an arrangement for the use of a highway in a particular manner being for the advantage of the public would be an answer to an indictment for that arrangement, this was not an arrangement for the ordinary use of the highway, but was withdrawing so much of the highway from its ordinary use as such; for it was impossible to use as an ordinary part of this highway the portion taken up by the tramways. (n) So where, on a like indictment it appeared that telegraph posts were erected with the assent of the authorities, who were the guardians of the highways, either on the highway, or on strips of land by the side thereof; Martin, B., held that a permanent obstruction erected on a highway, without lawful authority, which renders the way less commodious to the public, is a nuisance; and if the jury believed that the defendants placed [for the purpose of profit to themselves] posts with the intention of keeping them permanently there [in order to make a telegraphic communication between distant places], and did permanently keep them there, and the posts were of such size as to obstruct the passage of carriage horses or foot passengers on the part of road where they stood, the jury ought to find the defendants guilty; and that the circumstances that the posts were not placed on the hard part of the road, or upon a footpath formed upon it, or that sufficient space for the public traffic remained, were immaterial; and this ruling was held right; because in effect it came to this, whether there was a practical obstruction to the public using the highway. (o)

Telegraph posts.

It is a nuisance to break up the streets in a town for the purpose of laying down gas pipes, (p) and where certain commissioners had power to light the public streets of a town and to lay down pipes for that purpose, but no power to lay down pipes for the supply of private houses, and they transferred their powers to a company who had no powers as a gas company; it was held that this company was indictable for laying down pipes to private houses, but not for laying down pipes for the public lighting of the town. (q)

Gas pipes.

Wherever a public way exists, the public have a right to enjoy it with ease and security, and if a man prevents that enjoyment, even by the use of his own property, he is guilty of a nuisance. If, therefore, the owner of land over which a public way passes excavates his land on each side thereof so as to leave the line of the way between two precipices, or makes an excavation so near to one side of the way that a person walking upon it might, by making a false step, or being affected by sudden giddiness, or in consequence of its being dark, or in the case of a horse or carriage way might by the sudden starting of a horse, be thrown into the excavation, this is a public nuisance; for the danger thus created may reasonably deter prudent persons from using the way, and thus the full enjoyment of it by the public, is, in effect, as much impeded as in the case of an ordinary nuisance to a highway. (r)

Nor can it be doubted that many other things may be done so near to a highway as to create a nuisance, as the running of railway locomotives, (s) erecting a windmill and the like, so near to the highway as to frighten horses travelling upon it.

A bridge.

It has been doubted whether a person can build a bridge over a highway. (t) But it is plain that this must be a question for a jury in every case; for a bridge may be built in such a manner as either to be no nuisance or a great nuisance to a highway. (u)

Narrowing a highway.

There can be no doubt that any contracting or narrowing of a public highway is a nuisance: it is frequently, however, difficult to determine how far in breadth a highway extends, as where it runs across a common, or where there is a hedge only on one side of the way, or where, though there are hedges on both sides, the space between them is much larger than what is necessary for the use of the public: in these cases it would be for a jury to determine how far the way extended. (v) It seems that in ordinary cases, where a road runs between fences, not only the part which is maintained as solid road, but the whole space between the fences is to be considered as highway. In a late case, Lord Tenterden, C. J., said, 'I am strongly of opinion that when I see a space of fifty or sixty feet, through which a road passes, between enclosures set out under an Act of Parliament, that unless the contrary be shown the public are entitled to the whole of that space, although, perhaps, from economy the whole may not have been kept in repair. If it were once held that only the middle part, which carriages ordinarily run upon, was the road, you might by degrees enclose up to it, so that there would not be room left for two carriages to pass. The space at the sides is also necessary to afford the benefit of air and sun. If trees and hedges might be brought close up to the part actually used as the road, it could not be kept sound.' (w) And in a late case (x) it was laid down by the Court that 'where a highway passes through an inclosed country it is not the formed road merely (whether of pavement, gravel or other material), but the whole space from fence to fence is the highway, and an obstruction in any part is equally the subject of indictment. The extent of a highway where it passes over a common, is frequently still more indefinite to the right and left of what may be the ordinary passage.' So on an indictment for obstructing a highway by telegraph posts placed in some cases on strips of land by the side of the road, and in some cases where the strips were so broken up or covered with briars as to be practically impassable, it was held that in the case of an ordinary highway, although it may be of a varying or unequal width, running between fences, one on each side, the right of passage or way primâ facie, and unless there be evidence to the contrary, extends to the whole space between the fences, and the public are entitled to the use of the entire of it as a highway, and are not to be confined to the part which may be metalled or kept in repair for the more convenient use of carriages or foot passengers. (y)

Upon an indictment for enclosing strips of land upon the sides of a highway, the question is, were these strips part of the highway, and used as such by the public. (z)

Where a person laid a railway four hundred yards along the side of a turnpike road, occupying a breadth of between three and four feet, and in several parts not leaving space enough for two carriages to pass each other safely without running upon the bars of the railway, which, however, did not rise an inch above the surface of the road. The passage of coal-waggons along the turnpike was very great, and without the railroad a much larger number must have been employed to perform the same work. There also was a considerable traffic on the turnpike. The jury were told that if they thought the effect of the railway was to obstruct, hinder, and inconvenience the public, they should find a verdict of guilty, and it was held that the direction was right. 'The question whether the railway was an obstruction or not was a question of fact, and properly left to the jury. It was urged that if the thing complained of furnishes upon the whole a greater convenience to the public than it takes away, no indictment lies for a nuisance. Supposing that doctrine to be sound, which I am not prepared to say, how does it apply in this case? Here is a road for carts bringing down coals to S., and it is for the convenience of an individual, who sends coal there for sale, to make a railway along the public road for their conveyance in waggons. It is said, indeed, that all persons may use this railway who will pay for so doing, but no man has a right to tell the public that they shall discontinue the use of such carriages as they have been accustomed to employ, and adopt another kind, in order to pass along a new description of road, paying him for the liberty of doing so. I think this furnishes no excuse for the obstruction.' (a) And as it has been held that it is no defence to an indictment for a nuisance to a navigable river to prove that, although the work be in some degree a hindrance to navigation, it is advantageous in a greater degree to other uses of the river; (b) so, it should seem, that it is no defence to an indictment for a nuisance to a highway, that the thing complained of furnishes, on the whole, a greater convenience to the public than it takes away. (c)

But where an Act authorized the making of a railroad near a highway, and the locomotive engines frightened the horses travelling on the highway, it was held that an indictment could not be sustained; for the legislature must be presumed to have known that travellers upon the highway would, in all probability, be incommoded by the engines using the railroad, and therefore there was nothing unreasonable in supposing the legislature intended that the part of the public which should use the highway should sustain some inconvenience for the sake of the greater good to be obtained by other part of the public travelling along the railway. (c)

Where the power is conditional, the condition must be performed.

But where a statute authorizes any company or persons to intermeddle with a highway provided they fulfill certain conditions, and they interfere with the highway without performing those conditions, they are liable to be indicted, and either the body corporate or the persons who cause the highway to be interfered with may be indicted.

Where a railway company has authority to cut through a highway, but they are required before they do so to make another road as convenient to the public, they are indictable if they cut through the highway before making such a convenient road.

Upon an indictment for obstructing a highway, it appeared that the Manchester and Leeds Railway Company were empowered by statute to cut through and make obstructions in public roads for the purposes of the Act, doing as little damage as might be, and subject to the provisions and restrictions therein mentioned, and a subsequent section enacted that wherever any part of any public road should be found necessary to be cut through or so much injured as to be impassable or inconvenient for passengers, the company should, before any such road should be cut through, cause a good and sufficient road to be made instead thereof as convenient for passengers and carriages as the road cut through, or as near thereto as might be. The company, when making their railway, stopped up the public highway, and made a branch restoring the communication between the termini formerly connected by that highway, but by a different line. The new road was stated to be in some respects more convenient to the public than the old, but in others less so. The levels of the adjacent land made it impracticable to give a more convenient line consistently with the regulations of the Act, unless at an expense which, it was said, would be unreasonably great, and quite disproportioned to the benefit which would accrue from it to any part of the public. Maule, J., directed the jury to find a verdict of not guilty if they thought that the company had done no more damage than was necessary, and had made the road as convenient as the former one, or as nearly so as might be: intimating, as his own opinion, that the road could not be deemed absolutely as convenient even after allowing for the advantages which the public might have gained from it. But that the company were not, in his opinion, bound to lay out enormous sums of money to procure a slight accommodation to some persons; and that the proper rule seemed to be, that, if they could not make the road as convenient as before without a very disproportionate and unwarrantable expenditure, they should make it as nearly so as they could. And he left it to them to say whether the new road was as convenient as the old, or if not as nearly so as might be. The jury found a verdict of guilty, and on a motion for a new trial it was contended that an indictment would not lie because the Act charged was one which the statute permitted. Lord Denman, C. J., 'The work complained of as a nuisance, and undoubtedly making one, is the cutting through of the carriage road. Now there is no question as to their right to do this; and though they are required, when they do it, to cause another road to be set out and made instead of it, they argue that they are no longer indictable for a nuisance in doing the lawful act, however they may be for disobedience of the law in neglecting to substitute another. The prosecutors reply by referring to the section, which requires the company to cause the new road to be made before they cut through the old. But the company rejoin, that from the state of the earth there it was impossible to do this, and could not be intended by the legislature. This argument we think inadmissible, for reasons too obvious to require a full statement of them. The company have done what the Act legalises only on a condition, which they have not performed. They stand convicted of the nuisance and show no justification. The verdict will therefore not be disturbed.' (d)

The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 49, enacts that when any Railway is carried over a turnpike road by a bridge, the arch shall be such as to leave a clear space of not less than thirty-five feet. Sec. 51 enacts that wherever the average available width for the passage of carriages of any existing roads is less than the width hereinbefore prescribed for bridges over the railway, the width of such bridges need not be greater than such average available width; but so that such bridges be not of less width in the case of a turnpike or public carriage road than twenty feet; that if such average available width shall be at any time increased beyond the width of such bridge, the railway company shall be bound to widen the bridge to such extent as they may be required by the trustees or surveyors of the road, not exceeding the width of the road as so widened, or the maximum width herein or in the special Act prescribed for a bridge in like case over a railway; and it has been held that the effect of this clause is that if the average available width for the passage of carriages on any road is more than thirty-five feet, the road may be narrowed to thirty-five feet under the arch; where it is less, the arch may be made the same width as the road, so that it be not less than twenty feet wide, and if the road be afterwards widened, the arch must be widened in proportion up to, but not beyond, thirty-five feet; but in this reckoning footpaths are not to be included. Therefore, where the road, including footpaths, was forty-three feet wide, but without these only twenty-eight, and the railway arch, thirty-five feet in width, stood partly upon and narrowed the foot path, but left the carriage way of its original width, it was held, on an indictment for obstructing the carriage way only, and not mentioning any footway, that the said Act and a railway Act incorporating it had been complied with, although the latter Act provided that wherever the railway crossed the road otherwise than at right angles, the bridge should be made with a skew arch (which had been done) 'so as not in any manner to alter the direction of or to interfere with the line of the said roads, or the footpaths to the same.'(e)

A body corporate is indictable for obstructing a highway.

So an incorporated railway company may be indicted for cutting through and obstructing a highway by a bridge and other works not made according to the provisions of their Act of Parliament; for though a corporation cannot be guilty of treason, felony or other offences, which derive their character from the corrupted mind of the person committing them, and are violations of the social duties that belong to men and subjects, they may be guilty as a body corporate of commanding acts to be done to the nuisance of the community at large.(f)

Of nuisances to highways by not repairing them.

As a nuisance in not repairing highways is an offence in the nature of a nonfeasance, the principal inquiry upon this subject will be as to the persons who are liable to be called upon to keep them in repair.

The parish is of common right bound to repair highways within it.

Others made liable by statute.

The inhabitants of the parish at large are primâ facie, and of common right, bound to repair all highways lying within it, unless by prescription, or otherwise, they can throw the burden upon particular persons.(g) And to such an extent is this obligation, that if the inhabitants of a township bound by prescription to repair the roads within the township be expressly exempted by the provisions of a road Act from the charge of repairing new roads to be made within the township, that charge must necessarily fall upon the rest of the parish.(h) And upon the same principle it was holden, that if particular persons were made chargeable to the repair of such highways by a statute lately made, and become insolvent, the justices of peace might put that charge upon the rest of the inhabitants.(i) And where a statute enacted that the paving of a particular street should be under the care of commissioners, and provided a fund to be applied to that purpose, and another statute, which was passed for paving the streets of the parish, contained a clause that it should not extend to the particular street, it was held that the inhabitants of the parish were not exempted from their common law liability to keep that street in repair; that the duty of repairing might be imposed upon others, and the parish be still liable; and that the parish were under the obligation, in the first instance, of seeing that the street was properly paved, and might seek a remedy over against the commissioners.(k) And where a local turnpike Act, empowering the trustees under it to take tolls, directed that the roads should from time to time be repaired by the trustees, out of the money arising by virtue of that Act, it was holden that this

No express decision was pronounced on this objection, but it must have been overruled, as the Court gave judgment only made the tolls an auxiliary fund in the hands of the trustees; and that the inhabitants of the township where the road was situate, who by prescription were bound to repair all roads within it, were nevertheless liable to be indicted for the nonrepair of the road. (l) And where upon an indictment against a township for the nonrepair of a highway it appeared that by the 12 Geo. 1, c. 38, s. 15, the proprietors of a navigation were ordered to make the highway in question and keep it in repair, and were made liable to indictment and fine in case of default, and the 17th section provided that nothing in the Act should excuse the inhabitants of the township from contributing to the repairs with their carts, &c., or otherwise as they were then obliged to do by law; and the jury found that the highway was an ancient highway, and therefore the liability of the township existed at the time the Act passed; the Court of Queen's Bench held that the intention to preserve the common law liability of the township was sufficiently declared, and although the probable intention was that each party should contribute to the repair, and no provision was made for adjusting the proportion of each, the difficulty of apportioning the burden did not create an exemption for either, and therefore an indictment for nonrepair lay against the township, (m) and also against the company; for although the expenses of the repairs of the road had exceeded the amount of tolls received, it did not follow that the other resources of the company were not adequate, and, even if they were not, the obligation was imposed without condition, and the liability to indictment for nonrepair expressly enacted. (n) No agreement can exonerate a parish from the common law liability to repair; and a count in an indictment against the corporation of Liverpool, stating that they were liable to repair a highway, by virtue of a certain agreement, with the owners of houses alongside of it, was held to be bad, on the ground that the inhabitants of the parish, who are primâ facie bound to the repair of all highways within their boundaries, cannot be discharged from such liability by any agreement with others. (o)

A parish may be liable, although an Act makes a canal company liable.

No agreement can exonerate a parish.

Upon an indictment against the township of S., for not repairing a road within it, on a custom alleged and proved that all the townships in the parish repaired their own roads, it was proved that the township was adjacent to the township of N. M. in another parish, and that an agreement had been made, two hundred and fifty years before, between the then owner of the whole of S., and the then owners of the whole of N. M., whereby the boundary between the properties was marked out, and the owner of S. agreed to allow the owners of N. M., and the rest of the inhabitants of N. M., a road through S., of which the owner of S. was to repair half and the owners of N. M. the other half (which was the part

The owner of S. afterwards filed a bill for a specific performance, but it did not appear what the result of the suit was. As far back as living memory went, the inhabitants of N. the new highway to appear before the justices at the next special sessions for the highways to be held in and for the division in which the said intended highway shall be situate; and the question as to the utility as aforesaid of such highway shall be determined at the discretion of such justices.' (t)

This section must have a reasonable construction, and cannot be considered to extinguish roads already public by dedication; otherwise, almost all roads not being immemorial, however important and public, would become extinguished; the term 'made' as used in the Act, therefore, applies to a road formed or made, but not completely dedicated by use or otherwise at the passing of the Act; but roads dedicated at that time are out of the operation of the Act. It does not, therefore, apply to a road which had been extinguished by an award under an inclosure Act in 1784, but subsequently used by the public and repaired by a tithing. (u) This section does not apply to a road made by turnpike trustees; for that is not a road made by a person or body proposing to dedicate it; but by persons who had no power to dedicate it. The legislature contemplated the case of a private person making a road for the purpose of dedicating it, or setting out a private driftway under an inclosure Act, and not the case of a turnpike road. (v) And therefore where a road was made by turnpike trustees, and continued to be used after the expiration of the Turnpike Act in 1848, it was held that this section did not apply. (w)

This section does not prevent the way from becoming public, but only exempts a parish from the liability to repair the way where the steps required by this section have not been adopted. An action, therefore, may be maintained for obstructing a way dedicated to the public and used by them, although it had never been repaired by the parish, and neither the notice of dedication had been published, nor the certificate given as required by this section. (x) And where a road has been dedicated to the public by a landowner, but the conditions of this section have not been fulfilled, if a positive obstruction be erected in it, the party causing such obstruction is liable for so doing; but if the road be simply unfit for use, from the state of the weather, or from mere want of repair, the public lose the use of it, and neither the landlord nor any one else is liable to the repair of it. (y)

Formerly it was held that if a parish lay in two counties, the inhabitants of that part of the parish in which the road charged to be out of repair lay were bound to repair it, and not the inhabitants of the whole parish. (z) But it has since been decided that if part of a parish be situate in one county and the rest in another, and a highway lying in one part be out of repair, an indictment against the inhabitants of that part only is bad: and that in such case the indictment must be against the whole parish. (a) And it appears to have been always considered that the indictment under such circumstances must be preferred in that county wherein the ruinous part of the road lies. (b) If the indictment be against that part of the parish only which lies in the county in which the indictment is preferred, it must show on what account such part only is chargeable, otherwise it will be bad in substance: and the objection may be taken, even after an issue on the point, whether the inhabitants of that part were bound to repair, and a verdict for the crown. Repair of highways divided and allotted by justices on account of the boundaries of parishes being in the middle of them.

Proviso in case of highway repaired by party ratione tenuræ, &c.

Parishes, &c., bound to repair the part so allotted.

The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 58, which, when the boundaries of parishes are in the middle of highways, gives two justices power to divide such highways by a transverse line, has been already noticed. (d) The object of that statute was to facilitate the repairing of a highway so situated: and it enacts that the justices may order that the whole of such highway, on both sides, in one of such parts, shall be repaired by one of such parishes; and that the whole of such highway, on both sides, in the other of such parts, shall be repaired by the other of such parishes: and that they shall cause their order and plan of the highway to be filed with the clerk of the peace. Provided, nevertheless, 'that in the case of any such last-mentioned highway, the repair of any part of which belongs to any body politic or corporate, or to any person, by the reason of tenure of any lands, or otherwise howsoever, the same proceedings may be adopted, but the said body politic or corporate, or person, or some one on their behalf, may appear before such justices, and object to such last-mentioned proceedings, in which case the said justices shall, before they divide such highway as aforesaid, hear and consider the objection so made, and determine the same.'

Sec. 59. 'After such order and plan shall be so filed with the clerk of the peace as aforesaid, such parishes and body politic or corporate, or person aforesaid respectively, shall be bound as of common right to maintain and keep in repair such parts of such highways so allotted to them as aforesaid, and shall be liable to be proceeded against for neglect of such duty, and shall in all respects whatsoever be liable and subject to all the provisions, regulations, and penalties contained in this Act, and also shall be discharged from the repair of such part of such highway as shall not be included in their respective allotment.' (e) Sec. 61, the statute shall not affect or alter the boundaries of counties, lordships, &c., nor any other division of public or private property, nor the

(b) Rex v. Clifton, 5 T. R. 498; and Rex v. Weston, supra. In Rex v. Clifton, Lord Kenyon, C. J., in answer to one of the supposed difficulties of this mode of proceeding, said, 'On an indictment against a parish for not repairing a road, it is not necessary for the prosecutor to serve every individual in the parish with process; he may compel the appearance of any two, who live within the county, upon whom the whole fine may be levied; and the rest of the inhabitants must reimburse those two under the general highway Act.'

(c) Rex v. Clifton, 5 T. R. 498.

(e) Sec. 60 provides for the costs in thus apportioning highways; and sec. 61 provides for the manner in which highways repairable by reason of tenure, or otherwise howsoever, may be made parish highways. See the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, ss. 34, 35, where there are local boards.

boundaries of parishes, otherwise than for the purpose of repairing such particular portion of the highways.

Where an order was made by two justices for apportioning a highway in the form given by the 34 (Geo. 3, c. 64, s. 1, (f)) it was held that such order was conclusive as to the fact that part of the highway so apportioned lay in each of the parishes, and that it was not competent for one of the parishes, upon an indictment for not repairing the part allotted to it by the order, to prove that in fact at the time the order was made no portion of such part was in that parish, and therefore the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order, on the ground that, although the statute did not require the justices to find expressly that part of the way is in either parish, yet as they are 'to examine' and then 'finally determine the matter,' that implies that they are to be satisfied as to the situation of the highway in the respective parishes. (g)

Where a road lay in two parishes, and no division and allotment under this statute had been made, it was held that an indictment against one of the parishes for not repairing one side of the road ought to have stated that the parish was liable to repair ad filum viæ; and it seems that in such case it is not sufficient to aver that a certain part of the road (setting out the length and one-half of the breadth) is out of repair, and that the inhabitants, &c., ought to repair it. (h)

Indictment of the moiety of a highway.

Exceptions were taken to an indictment for suffering a highway to be very muddy, and so narrow that people could not pass without danger of their lives; first, that it is no offence for a highway to be dirty in winter; and, secondly, that the parish had no power to widen it, as there was a particular power vested by Act of Parliament in justices of the peace to do so. The indictment was held bad for want of saying that the way was out of repair; and one of the judges observed, that saying that the way was so narrow that the people could not pass was repugnant to its being 'the King's highway;' for that if it had been so narrow, the people could never have passed there time out of mind. (i)

Exceptions to an indictment; that it is no offence for highways to be dirty, and that the parish is not bound to widen a highway.

Where a road indicted led across a small inlet or estuary of a river not far from its mouth, and was not passable at high water, and was usually a soft sludge at ebb; Patteson, J., directed the jury that if they thought the want of repair arose from the nature of the spot over which the road passed, and was occasioned by the river flowing over it at every tide, washing away the materials placed there to form the road, and leaving in their place a deposit of mud, it would be absurd to require the parish to do repairs, which, from the nature of things, must always be

(g) Reg. v. Hickling, 7 Q. B. 880. See Reg. v. Perkins, 14 Q. B. 229, that to the jurisdiction under this clause the existence of a boundary on the highway to be divided is a condition precedent, and the Court quashed an order, which had been confirmed at sessions, because on the facts stated it did not appear that there was such a boundary, but this was on the ground that all the facts were brought before the Court. See Mould v. Williams, 5 Q. B. 469, that an order to remove timber from a highway is conclusive in an action that the place is a highway.

Particular subdivisions of a parish or particular individuals may be liable to repair highways.

ineffectual. (k) And in the same case the same learned judge held that where two parishes are separated by a river the presumption is, that the boundary line is the middle line of the channel. (k)

But though the parish is bound primâ facie and of common right to repair the highways within it, yet a particular subdivision of a parish, or particular individuals, may be liable to relieve them from that onus, by reason of prescription, or the inclosure of the land in which the highway lies.

Thus the inhabitants of a district, township, or other division of a parish, and also particular individuals, may be bound to repair a highway by prescription; and it is said, that a corporation aggregate may be charged by a general prescription that it ought and hath used to do it, without showing that it used to do so in respect of the tenure of certain lands, or for any other consideration; because such a corporation never dies, and, therefore, if it were ever bound to such a duty, it must continue to be so; neither is it any plea that the corporation have done it out of charity. (l) But it is said, that such a general prescription is not sufficient to charge a private person; because no man is bound to do a thing which his ancestors have done, unless it be for some special reason; as having lands descended to him holden by such service, &c. (m) And a man cannot be liable to repairs merely as lord of a manor, though it is stated that the lords have repaired it from time whereof, &c. (n) This applies to individual persons only, and not to an aggregate of persons who compose the inhabitants of a district or division in a parish or township in which the road is situate. (o) But it has been holden in a late case, that where a parish is charged with the reparation of a highway, lying in alienâ parochiâ, a consideration must be stated. To an indictment against a parish for not repairing a highway lying within it, a plea that the inhabitants of another parish 'have repaired, and been used and accustomed to repair, and of right ought to have repaired,' was held ill, and that the plea ought to have shown a consideration. Holroyd, J., at the conclusion of his judgment, said, 'I say nothing as to the form of pleading where the highway lies within a township or division of a parish which is charged with the repairs.' (p)

And where the inhabitants of a county pleaded that the inhabitants of a particular township had immemorially repaired the highway at the end of a county bridge, situate within the township, the Court held that it was not necessary to state any consideration for such prescription. (q)

been repaired by another township, but it was contended that the liability to repair could not be fixed on the latter township without showing some consideration, and no evidence of this kind was given; it was answered that a consideration might be inferred from the fact of repair; but the point was not decided. *Reg. v. Where, in an indictment against a township for nonrepair of a road, the prescription stated and proved was that its inhabitants had been immemorially used to repair all roads situate within it, which but for such usage would be repairable by the parish at large; it was holden that this placed the township in the situation of a parish; and that it was necessary for the defendants to show, by evidence, some other persons in certainty who were liable, in order to deliver themselves from their liability to repair. (r) Where, however, the origin of a way is accounted for, the prescription is destroyed. (s)

Townships.

Where to an indictment against a parish for not repairing a highway the defendants pleaded that the parish had immemorially been divided into five townships, and that each of them had immemorially repaired all the highways within it that would otherwise be repairable by the parish, and that the highway indicted was situated within one of the townships, and ought to be repaired by it; the Court of Queen's Bench held that evidence that the four other townships had immemorially repaired their own highways, that no surveyor of highways had ever been appointed for the parish, and that the township in question had repaired a highway lately formed within it, was evidence upon which the jury might find that the township in question was liable to repair all highways within it, and that it was not necessary to prove that there were or had been any ancient highways within it. (t)

liability of a township.

Where an extra-parochial and uninhabited district was divided into seven townships by certain Acts of Parliament, it was held that one of the townships was not liable to repair a public road situate within it, as the Acts did not expressly impose such liability upon the township, and the origin of everything (including the township and the road itself) being clearly ascertained, no inference could be raised as to the liability to repair the road by usage or prescription. (u)

New townships created by statute.

The liability of a township to repair by prescription may, as we have seen, be such as to place the township on the same footing as a parish, in respect to the roads within its limits. The liability may be to repair all highways within the township, which but for the prescription and usage would have been repairable by the parish at large; and in such case the township must not only repair immemorial roads, but also any new highway which may have been made within its limits, and which the parish might have been called upon to repair in the absence of any such prescription. (v) Where an indictment against a township for not repairing part of a highway situate within the township, averred that 'the inhabitants of the said township from time whereof the memory, &c., have repaired and amended, and been used and accustomed to repair and amend, and still ought to repair and amend all common and public highways situate within the township used for all the liege subjects of the realm to go, return,' &c.; after a verdict of guilty it was moved in arrest of judgment that it charged the township with a customary liability to repair all roads within it, whereas it ought to have charged a liability to repair all roads within it, 'which but for the custom would be repairable by the parish.' But the Court of Queen's Bench held that although those words had of late years been introduced, they were not necessary: where they were introduced they put the township primâ facie in the same position as a parish; and if the defendants meant to assert that any individuals were liable to repair the road in question, ratione tenuræ or otherwise (if it could be), they must plead that matter specially; but where those words were omitted and the defendants pleaded, not guilty, it became incumbent on the prosecutor to prove that the township was liable to repair all roads within it; which might be if there were none repairable by individuals: but if the defendants could show that there were any so repairable, they would negative the custom as being laid too largely. It was a question of evidence, and not of pleading; and in truth the words in question were introduced within living memory for the very purpose of avoiding a failure which frequently happened by reason of the custom laid being larger than the evidence warranted. Nevertheless the custom may be laid as in the present indictment, if no roads in the township are repairable by individuals other than the inhabitants at large. (w) But an extra-parochial place is not as such bound of common right to repair its own roads; and some ground for charging it must be stated: at least, unless it be shown negatively that it is not parcel of any district bound to repair the district roads. The indictment stated, that part of a highway in an extra-parochial hamlet was out of repair, and that the inhabitants of the hamlet ought to repair it. Upon error brought, on the ground that no immemorial obligation, nor any special ground to make them liable, was stated, it was urged that they were liable of common right, and that an extra-parochial place stood in this respect on the footing of a parish: but the Court held that they could not consider a common law obligation as attaching upon the inhabitants of the hamlet from necessity, unless it were shown negatively that the hamlet was not parcel of any other district liable to repair its own roads; and the judgment was reversed. (x)

Extra-parochial place.

Inhabitants cannot be charged ratione tenuræ.

The inhabitants of a district cannot be charged ratione tenuræ, because unincorporated inhabitants cannot, quâ inhabitants, hold lands: and a district cannot be charged by prescription alone (without a consideration) to repair what is not within such district. The indictment stated that an ancient bridge, in the parishes of M. and P., in the highway there, was out of repair; and that the inhabitants of the parish of P. and of the town of M. aforesaid, from time whereof, &c., and by reason of the tenure of certain lands in the said parish and town, had repaired and of right ought to repair it. Upon error it was urged that inhabitants as such could not be charged ratione tenuræ; and that as it did not appear that any part of the bridge was in the township of M., the indictment against the township, on the ground of

(w) Reg. v. Heage, 2 Q. B. 128.

(x) Rex v. Kingsmoor, 2 B. & C. 190.

immemorial obligation, could not be supported; and the Court being of that opinion the judgment was reversed. (y) Where an indictment alleged that the inhabitants of three townships in a parish were liable to repair a public road, it was objected, but without success, that the indictment was bad for charging three townships conjointly; since, if all were liable, it was the separate neglect of each. (z)

Where lands bound to the repair of a bridge or highway ratione tenuræ are conveyed to several persons, every one of the grantees, being a tenant of any parcel, is liable to the whole charge, and must have contribution from the others. So where a manor so bound is conveyed to several persons, a tenant of any parcel, either of the demesnes or services, is liable to the whole repair, and may call upon the tenants of the residue to contribute; and the grantees are chargeable with the repair, though the grantor should convey the lands or manor discharged of the repair; and the grantees must have their remedy against the grantor. And the reason seems to be, because the whole manor or land, and every part thereof, in the possession of one tenant, being once chargeable with the repair, it shall remain so, notwithstanding any act of the owner. For the law will not suffer him to apportion the charge, and so make the remedy for the public benefit more difficult; or, by alienations to insolvent persons, to render the remedy against such persons quite frustrate. And though such lands or manor come into the hands of the crown, yet the obligation or duty continues; and any person afterwards claiming the whole, or any part of it, under the crown, will be liable to an indictment for not repairing. (a)

Each of several persons, being grantees of lands bound to repair, is liable to the whole charge.

As an inclosure of a highway takes away the liberty and convenience which the public have of going upon the adjoining lands when the highway is out of repair, (c) it has been holden, that if the owner of lands not inclosed next adjoining to a highway incloses his lands on both sides, he is bound to make a perfectly good way as long as the inclosure lasts; and is not excused by showing that he has made the way as good as it was at the time of the inclosure; because, if it was then defective, the public might have gone upon the adjoining land. (d) So if a man incloses land on one side, which has been anciently inclosed on the other side, he ought to repair all the way; but if there is no such ancient inclosure on the other side, he ought to repair but half the way. Thus, if there be an old hedge, time out of mind, belonging to A. on the one side of the way, and B. having land lying on the other side, make a new hedge, there B. shall be charged with the whole repair: but if A. make a hedge on the one side of the way, and B. on the other, they shall be chargeable by moieties. opinion has, however, been expressed that such liability does not accrue where either the highway is not immemorial, or where the adjoining land inclosed has not been used for passage before the inclosure. (f) And where such a liability exists it lies on the occupier of the lands inclosed and not on the owner as owner. (g) But a person, having made himself liable to repair a highway by reason of inclosure, may relieve himself from the burthen of any further reparations by throwing it open again. (h) Thus if a person remove an encroachment, and leave that part of the road which was injured by the encroachment in a perfect state, his liability to repair ratione coarctationis ceases. (i) But if a person charged ratione tenuræ pleads that the liability to repair arose from an encroachment which has been removed, and it appears that the road has been repaired by the defendant for twenty-five years since the removal of the alleged encroachment; this is presumptive evidence that the defendant repaired ratione tenuræ generally, and renders it necessary for him to show the time when the encroachment was made. (k) Where a road has been so inclosed, and it is insufficient, any passenger may break down the inclosure, and go over the adjoining land. (l)

Repairs of a road made in pursuance of a writ of ad quod damnum.

Where a new road is made in pursuance of a writ of ad quod damnum, (m) the owner of the land is not obliged to repair the new road, unless the jury impose such a condition upon him: but the parishioners ought to keep it in repair for the future; because, being discharged from repairing the old road, no new burden is laid upon them, but their labour is only transposed from one place to another. But if the new road lie in another parish, then the person who sued out the writ and his heirs ought not only to make it, but to keep it in repair; otherwise the parishioners of such other parish would have a new charge upon them, and no recompense, by the former road being taken away. (n) Where a highway is inclosed under the authority of an Act of Parliament for dividing and inclosing open common fields, the person who incloses is not bound to repair it. (o)

(f) Per Erle, J., and semble per Crompton, J., in Reg. v. Ramsden, E. B. & E. 949. Where the origin of a road is recent, the circumstances of the dedication, or the user by which the right of road has been acquired, may well exclude any right to go on the adjoining land; e. g., where the object of laying out a street is that houses may be built on both sides of it. See the judgment of Crompton, J., ibid.

(g) Reg. v. Ramsden, supra. In this case the road indicted was set out under an inclosure Act, and the land on each side was allotted under the Act, which authorized the persons to whom the lands were allotted to inclose them; it is extremely difficult, therefore, to see how any liability could be incurred by making such an inclosure, and equally so to see how the public could have any right to go out of the line of road set out under the Act. In such a case the rights of the public and the liabilities of the owners would seem to depend entirely on the Act, and yet no notice whatever was taken of it in the case.

liable to the repair of any part of the road, under the care and management of such trustees or commissioners, or of any bridges thereon, by tenure, or otherwise, for the repair thereof, for such term as they shall think proper not exceeding three years; and to contribute towards the repair of such road or bridges such sum or sums of money as they shall think proper out of the tolls arising on such turnpike road. The Turnpike Act, 4 Geo. 4, c. 95, s. 68, enacts, that where parts of old turnpike roads are widened, altered, diverted, or turned by legal authority, the body corporate and person who were liable to the repair of the old road shall be liable to the repair of the new, or so much thereof as shall be equal to the burthen and expense of repairing such old road from which they were exonerated by so altering the same. And if the several parties interested cannot agree, two justices are empowered in the manner therein mentioned to view and settle the same; and to fix a gross sum or annual sum, to be paid by the body corporate or person towards the repair of the new road, with such consent and in such manner as is therein mentioned.

part of such roads by tenure concerning the future repair of them.

And where roads are turned, the persons liable to the repair of the old roads are to be liable to the repair of the new roads, or of certain proportions of them.

The 4 Geo. 4, c. 95, s. 68, applies to parishes as well as to individuals. Where, therefore, disputes having arisen between two parishes as to the proportion of a turnpike road, which each was bound to repair after it had been diverted by trustees, two justices made an order determining the proportions each parish was to repair; it was held that each parish was liable to repair the part so determined. (p)

The general statutes, making provision for repairing highways, were repealed and reduced into one Act: namely, the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, and the general statutes at present existing with respect to turnpike roads are the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, and the 4 Geo. 4, c. 95. There are also inclosure Acts and other statutes, both of a public and private nature, which relate to the repairs and management of the roads in particular places and districts. But these Acts, and especially the general statutes, are of great length, and branch out into a variety of clauses, a detail of which would not be consistent with the proposed limits of this work. It may, however, be useful to notice a few of the decided points which relate to their construction.

Statutes relating to the repairing of highways and turnpike roads.

It is no excuse for parishioners, being indicted at common law for not repairing the highways, that they have done their full work required by statute; for the statutes, being made in the affirmative, do not abrogate any provision of this kind by the common law. (q)

The statutes do not abrogate the common law provisions.

If trustees under a road Act turn a road through an inclosure, and make the fences at their own expense, and repair them for several years, they cannot be compelled to continue such repairs, unless there be a special provision in the Act to that effect. (r) In this case it was considered, that what is meant by a road is the surface over which the King's subjects have a right to pass, and not the fences on each side: and that the owners of the land are bound to repair the fences on each side, unless otherwise provided by the Act. (s)

Parish not bound to repair fences.

Where an indictment alleged in the usual way that the liege subjects could not pass and repass as they were wont and accustomed to do, and it appeared that there were precipices on the sides of the road, and no fences or guards to protect the passengers from such precipices, but there was no evidence of there having been any fences before, except that some had been put up after a former indictment; it was held that evidence of the want of fences was not admissible, for the public were in no worse a situation than they were wont and accustomed to be before, on account of the want of fences. (t) So where an open ditch or sewer, which ran along the side of a highway, had existed from time immemorial, and was a tidal stream, and the commissioners of sewers had from time to time cleansed it, but had never put up any fence to it. There had formerly been a wooden fence, but it had been permitted to go to decay, and it did not appear by whom it was erected; it was held that the commissioners were under no obligation to protect the highway: for this was an ancient sewer, which had existed with the highway time out of mind, and therefore the public had only a right to the highway subject to the sewer. (u) It seems that a parish was not liable to cleanse the ditches by the side of a highway, but that the owners of the adjoining lands were liable to cleanse them under the provisions of the old highway Act. On an indictment which charged the inhabitants of a parish with neglecting to repair the drains, gutters, and ditches by which the water was accustomed to run off the road, it was objected that the parish were not liable to cleanse the drains; and Tindal, C. J., said, 'Does the common law require the parish to cleanse the ditches? How do you get rid of the Highway Act?' (v)

It has been held that a turnpike Act, giving directions for repairing the road to and from a town, excludes the town. (w) The town had, lately before the Act was passed, been paved by the inhabitants, and it was kept in repair by them, and in several parts of the Act the roads were described as leading from, to, and through, particular towns; but when it mentioned the town in question, it only said, to and from the town, omitting the word 'through.' The 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 8, made the occupiers of such lands liable to cleanse all ditches, &c., for keeping highways dry, under a penalty of ten shillings, but no such provision is contained in the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

B. 412; or a congregation of inhabited houses so near to each other that they may reasonably be said to be continuous, and the term will include a space of open ground surrounded by continuous houses, and it should seem also all open spaces occupied as mere accessories to such houses, although not so surrounded. *Elliott v. So upon an indictment for illegally erecting a turnpike gate across a road leading 'from the town of Cheltenham to a place called Hewlett's Hill,' it was held that the town was excluded. (y) So where an indictment alleged a road to lead 'from and through the town of Upton,' towards the parish of Great Malvern, it was held that the town was thereby excluded. (z) So where an indictment charged that the defendant erected a gate across a certain road 'leading from the township of Detton' 'unto the town of Cleobury Mortimer,' and it appeared that the gate was erected across that part of the highway which was situate in the township of Detton; Coleridge, J., held that the indictment was not supported, as the words 'from' and 'to' excluded the termini. (a)

The commissioners appointed by the 6 Geo. 3, c. 78 (an Act for dividing and inclosing certain lands in the parish of Cottingham) which enacted, that the public roads to be set out by them should be repaired in such manner as other public roads are by law to be repaired, and that the private roads should be repaired by such person or persons as they should award, had no power to impose on the parish at large the burden of repairing any of the private roads set out in pursuance of the Act. (b)

And where under a similar Act the commissioners had made an order in 1802, that the private ways set out by them should be repaired by the inhabitants, and one of them had been used by the public in every way, and repaired by the parish up to 1825, when the inhabitants having, as was alleged, found out that they were not bound to obey the order, discontinued the repairs, and evidence was offered to show that the parish had been acting under a mistake; it was held that the inhabitants were not bound to obey the order, but that that was not conclusive of the case. In ordinary cases there was an owner of the land, but here there was none, except as directed by the Act; for the presumption that roads are the property of the adjacent owners (which is founded on the supposition that the roads originally passed over the lands of the owners, and therefore they still belong ad medium flum vicæ to the adjacent owners) does not hold where roads are made under an inclosure Act. The case turns on this question only, whether or no the parish repaired under a mistaken notion of liability. If they acted on a voluntary disposition on their part to repair a road, which was useful to a large class of persons, and for the convenience of the public, they ought to be convicted. If it was a mistake, they ought to be acquitted. (c) evidence of locality of a highway, the usage not having been pursuant to it, nor the proper notices proved.

inclosure Act, which awarded the highway to be in a different parish, was holden not to be admissible evidence for the defendants, without showing that the commissioners had given notices which the Act required to be given previously to the boundaries having been ascertained by them; it appearing that the usage had not been pursuant to the award; the defendants having since the award, as well as before, repaired the highway. The learned judge who tried this case reported that he should have had no difficulty in admitting the award, if the usage had been pursuant to it, and presuming that the proper notices had been given. (d)

We may now shortly consider the modes of proceeding by which persons guilty of these nuisances to highways may be prosecuted.

Proceedings against parties guilty of nuisances in highways by indictment, or information.

Nuisances or annoyances to highways, whether positive, in the nature of actual obstructions, or negative, by the defect of proper reparations, may be made the subject of indictment, which is the more usual course of proceeding. And formerly justices of assize and of the peace might have presented highways which were out of repair, but now by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 99, it is not lawful 'to take or commence any legal proceeding by presentment against the inhabitants of any parish, or other person, on account of any highway or turnpike road being out of repair.' (e)

Mode of proceeding before justices if highway is out of repair. (f)

A new mode of compelling the repairs of highways has been introduced by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 94, which enacts, that 'if any highway (g) is out of repair, or is not well and sufficiently repaired and amended, and information thereof, on the oath of one credible witness, is given to any justice of the peace, it shall and may be lawful for such justice, and he is hereby authorized and required to issue a summons requiring the surveyor of the parish, or other person or body politic or corporate chargeable with such repairs, to appear before the justices at some special sessions for the highways in the said summons mentioned, to be held within the division in which the said highway may be situate; and the said justices shall either appoint some competent person to view the same, and report thereon to the justices in special sessions assembled, on a certain day and place to be then and there fixed, at which the said surveyor of the highways or other party as aforesaid, shall be directed to attend, or the said justices shall fix a day whereon they or any two of them shall attend to view the said highway; and if to the justices at special sessions, on the day and at the place so fixed as aforesaid, it shall appear, either on the report of the said person so appointed by them to view, or on the view of such justices, that the said highway is not in a state of thorough and effectual repair, they the said justices at such last-mentioned special sessions shall (h) convict the said surveyor or (f) The 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, s. 18, provides for these cases where local boards are established under that Act.

(g) This section only applies to cases where the way is admittedly a public highway, and the dispute confined to the liability to repair. Reg. v. Heanor, 6 Q.B. 748; and where a parish has been acquitted on an indictment ordered to be preferred under this section, the justices may well refuse to order another indictment. Reg. v. Somersetshire, 3 Law T. 316.

(h) This is not compulsory, but the justices may exercise a discretion whether other party liable to the repair of the said highway in any penalty not exceeding five pounds, and shall make an order on the said surveyor, or other person or bodies politic or corporate liable to repair such highway, by which order they shall limit and appoint a time for the repairing of the same; and in default of such repairs being effectually made within the time so limited, the said surveyor, or such other person or body politic or corporate as aforesaid, shall forfeit and pay to some person to be named and appointed in a second order a sum of money to be therein stated, and which shall be equal in amount to the sum which the said justices shall, on the evidence produced before them, judge requisite for repairing such highway, which money shall be recoverable in the same manner as any forfeiture is recoverable under this Act, and such money when recovered shall be applied to the repair of such highway, and in case more parties than one are bound to repair any such highway, the said justices shall direct in their said order what proportion shall be paid by each of the said parties; provided, that if the said highway so out of repair is a part of the turnpike road, the said justices shall (i) summon the treasurer or surveyor or other officer of such turnpike road, and the order herein directed to be made shall be made on such treasurer or surveyor or other officer as aforesaid, and the money therein stated shall be recoverable as aforesaid; provided nevertheless that the said justices shall not have power to make such order as aforesaid in any case where the duty or obligation of repairing the said highway comes in question.

In what cases justices cannot interfere.

* Sec. 95. 'If on the hearing of any such summons respecting the repair of any highway the duty or obligation of such repairs is denied by the surveyor on behalf of the inhabitants of the parish, or by any other party charged therewith, it shall then be lawful for such justices, and they are hereby required (l) to direct a bill of indictment to be preferred, and the necessary witnesses in support thereof to be subpœnaed, at the next assizes to be holden in and for the said county, or at the next general quarter sessions of the peace for the county, riding, division, or place wherein such highway shall be, against the inhabitants of the parish or the party to be named in such order for suffering and permitting the said highway to be out of repair; and the costs of such prosecution shall (m) be directed by the judge of assize before whom the said indictment is tried, or by the justices at such quarter sessions, to be paid out of the rate made and levied in pursuance of this Act in the parish in which such highway shall be situate: provided nevertheless that it shall be lawful for the party against whom such indictment shall be so preferred at the quarter sessions (n) as aforesaid to remove such indictment by certiorari or otherwise into his Majesty's Court of King's Bench.'

Mode of proceeding if obligation to repair is disputed. (k)

Another mode of proceeding is by information, which may be granted by the Court of King's Bench at their discretion. But they will not grant an information to compel a parish to repair a highway which is not much used; and when it appears that another highway, equally convenient to the public, is in good repair. And indeed they never give leave to file an information for not repairing a highway, unless it appear that the grand jury have been guilty of gross misbehaviour in not finding a bill; and they refuse it for this reason, that the fine set on conviction upon an information cannot be expended in the repair of the highway, whereas on an indictment it is always so expended. (o) But it has been granted against the inhabitants of a parish where it was shown that a bill of indictment had been thrown out by the grand jury, and that two of the grand jury were proprietors of land in the parish, and had taken an active part in opposing the finding of the indictment. (p)

Mandamus.

Of the form of the indictment. (r)

A mandamus will not be granted to repair a road. (q)

Though it is often stated in indictments for nuisances to highways, that 'from time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary,' or, 'from time immemorial,' there was and is a common and ancient King's highway, yet it is not necessary to do so; for it is sufficient to state in a compendious manner that it is a highway. (s) And if an indictment against a parish unnecessarily allege the road to have existed 'from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary,' and it appear that part of the highway had been made within living memory, this is no variance, for in an indictment against a parish it is not material whether the way be immemorial or not, as the instant it becomes a public way the parish is liable. (t) But it is otherwise where an immemorial custom is necessary to raise the liability. Where, therefore, an indictment for nonrepair of a highway stated that the inhabitants of a tithing from time immemorial had been used and accustomed to repair the said highway, and the way in question had been set out as a private road and a drift-way under an inclosure Act in 1784, for the use of the adjoining owners, who were directed to repair it; and the award under a power in the Act extinguished all ways, both public and private, not set out in it. The way had been publicly used before the inclosure, and since had been repaired occasionally by the tithing, and been used to a great extent by the public. It was objected, that whatever might be the facts as to the use and repair by the tithing before and since the inclosure, the award extinguished the road as a public way for some time at least, and therefore the allegation of immemorial user and liability to repair was not proved; and Maule, J., held that the indictment clearly failed on the facts. (u) And though it is usual to state the termini of the highway, it is said not to be necessary; on the ground that a public highway is intended to go through all the realm, and to lead from sea to sea.(v) But if the termini are stated, they must be substantially proved, according to the statement: (w) and the road must in general (if described at all) be described correctly. Thus, where a highway leading from A. to C., not passing through B., though communicating with it by means of a cross-road, was described as a road leading from A. to B., and from thence to C., the variance was held to be fatal.(x) An indictment describing a footpath as leading from A. towards and unto the parish church, is satisfied by proof of a public way leading from A. to the parish church, though turning backwards between A. and the church at an acute angle, and though the part from A. to the angle be an immemorial way, and the part from the angle to the church be recently dedicated.(y) So where an indictment alleged that the highway led from T. to E., and it appeared that a person travelling from T. to E. on the way described would pass into a turnpike road, travel a short distance along that road, and then turn off into a distinct road which led to E., it was objected that the portion of the highway between the turnpike road and E. was not part of a road from T. to E., inasmuch as a person leaving T. came into and travelled along a distinct line of turnpike road, before he entered upon the highway in question, which immediately led to E.; but the Court of Queen's Bench held that the way was properly described, as it was the nearest between T. and E., and a turnpike road is itself a parish road.(z) So where an indictment described the highway as leading from the town of Abingdon to the village of East Hendred, and it appeared that to go from Abingdon to East Hendred with a carriage a person would go along the Chilton turnpike road for about four miles, and then into and along Featherbed Lane (which was the part indicted), and then cross the Wantage turnpike road, and then go for a short distance along a road which led from the Wantage turnpike road to the village of East Hendred; it was objected that the road was misdescribed, as parts of it were turnpike; but it was held that the description was sufficient; for a road is not the less a highway because part of it happens to be a turnpike road.(a)

But the termini of the part out of repair are not material. Where, therefore, the unrepaired part of a highway was described as leading out of a highway 'at or near a place called Parkside,' and the place was Parkgate; it was held that this was immaterial.(b)

The highway must be alleged in the indictment to lie in the parish indicted, otherwise such parish is not bound to repair it; and if it be not so alleged, the indictment is erroneous, and judgment will be reversed.(c) Where an indictment averred that there was a highway in the town of Bishop Auckland, in the parish of St. Andrew Auckland, and that certain parts of the same highway, which were set out, and laid to be in the town of Bishop Auckland, were out of repair, and that the inhabitants of the township of Bondgate in Auckland, Newgate in Auckland, and the borough of Auckland, in the parish of St. Andrew Auckland, were liable to repair the same; it was held that the indictment was bad, because it did not show that the parts out of repair were within the townships indicted. (d) Nor will it cure the objection, that the part which is out of repair is expressly stated to be in the parish indicted, if such part be represented as part of the road before described. Thus, where an indictment against the parish of Gamlingay stated that there was a highway leading from the parish of Hartley St. George towards and unto the parish of Gamlingay, and that a certain part of the said highway situate in the said parish of Gamlingay was out of repair, it was moved in arrest of judgment that no part of the road, as described, lay in Gamlingay; and the Court held the objection fatal. (e) So where an indictment against the parish of Upton on Severn stated that there was a highway 'from and through the town of Upton on Severn,' and there was no express averment that the part out of repair was in the parish, it was held bad. (f) But where an indictment charged that the defendants removed the gravel over a culvert in the parish of Studley opposite to a mill there in a certain King's common highway there leading from Studley to Henley upon Arden, it was objected that it did not distinctly appear that the road obstructed was in the parish of Studley, and Rex v. Gamlingay (g) was relied upon; but it was held that the indictment in that case differed essentially from this indictment, because there was a distinct allegation that the nuisance was committed in the parish of Studley. The words leading from Studley to Henley would primâ facie import that it was a highway leading from a vill in the parish, and, therefore, must be considered as a highway leading from a vill or town situate in the parish to another place. (h) Where an indictment charged that the defendant at the township of W. upon a highway there leading from a highway leading from the village of W. towards the parish church of C. towards and unto a highway leading from the said village of W. towards and unto the township of L. W. by a certain wall there extending into the said highway unlawfully encroached, it was held that the words 'there' and 'said' could only be referred to the first-mentioned highway, and that the indictment was sufficient. (i) Where the indictment is against a particular person, charging him with the repair of a highway in respect of certain lands, it seems that the occupier, and not the owner, is the proper person against whom the indictment should be brought; on the ground that the public have no means of knowing who is the owner of the lands charged with the repair: and it does not seem to be material what estate the occupier has in the lands liable. (h) The averment of obligation to repair, in an indictment against a person for not repairing by reason of tenure, will, it seems, be sufficient, if it state that the defendant ought to repair by reason of the tenure of his lands, without adding that those who held the lands for the time being have immemorially repaired; a prescription being implied in the estate of inheritance in the land. (l) But it is not sufficient to state that the party is chargeable by being owner and proprietor of the property subject to the charge. (m) But an indictment against a particular part of a parish, such as a district, township, division, or the like, for not repairing a highway in the parish, stating that the inhabitants of the district from time immemorial ought to repair and amend it, is erroneous; it should state that the inhabitants of such district from time whereof, &c., have used and been accustomed, and of right ought to repair and amend it: for the inhabitants of a particular division of a parish not being bound to repair by common law, and their obligation arising necessarily only from custom or prescription, the indictment ought to show such custom, prescription or reason of their obligation. (n) So it was decided that a presentment under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 24 (now repealed) against a smaller district than a parish, must have stated expressly how the inhabitants thereof were liable to the repair of the roads, or that they have been liable immemorially. (o) We have seen that a material variance from the description of the road in the indictment will be fatal; so that a highway leading from A. to B., and communicating with C. by a cross-road, cannot be described as a highway leading from A. to C., and from thence to B. (p) In every indictment against a parish for not repairing a highway, there are three essential averments: the first, that the road is a highway; the second, that it is out of repair; and the third, that it is situated in the parish. (q)

(c) Rex v. Hartford, Cowp. 111.

Where the first count of an indictment alleged that there was a highway in the county of C., and that 'a certain part of the said highway situate, &c., in the township of W. in the parish of W. in the county aforesaid (describing it, and stating its length and breadth) was very ruinous,' &c.: and the second count alleged an immemorial usage for the inhabitants of the said township to amend so many of the highways, situate in the said township, as would otherwise be repairable by the parish at large, and that 'the said part of the same common highway hereinbefore mentioned to be ruinous, &c., as aforesaid' was a highway, which but for the said usage would be repairable by the parish at large; and that by reason of the premises the inhabitants of the said township ought to have repaired 'the same part of the said common highway so being ruinous, &c., as aforesaid;' the jury having found the defendants not guilty on the first count, but guilty on the second, it was objected, in arrest of judgment, that the second count was bad on the ground that it did not contain any sufficient averment that the highway was in the township, or out of repair; but the Court of Queen's Bench held that the words 'so being ruinous, &c., as aforesaid,' were a clear and specific reference to the first count, which contained a formal allegation that this part of the highway was out of repair, and there were many authorities to show that one count of an indictment might refer to another, and that under such circumstances the maxim applies verba relata inesse videntur. And as to the objection, that the second count did not show that the part indicted was situate in the township of W.; it had been determined that any qualities or adjuncts averred in one count to belong to any subject, if they are separate from it, shall not be supposed to be alleged as belonging to it in a subsequent count, which merely introduces it by reference as the same subject 'before mentioned.' (r) But the local situation of the part of the highway described must necessarily and invariably belong to it, and if once described as being in a particular township, when there is afterwards enough to identify it as being what is so described, a repetition of the allegation that it is within the township is not strictly necessary. (s)

A highway may be described as a common highway for carts, carriages, &c., although it has always been arched over, provided it be capable of being used by all ordinary carriages and notwithstanding the archway be not sufficiently high to permit road waggons and other carriages of unusual dimensions to pass under it. (t)

Where an indictment charged the nonrepair of a highway for horses, coaches, carts, and carriages, and there was no evidence that any carriages had ever gone the whole length of it, but the road had been repaired by the parish, and persons on horseback had frequently passed along it, it was held that the defendants could not be convicted, as there was no count charging that it was a road for horses. (u) And where an indictment stated that there was a pack and prime way between certain specified places, and it appeared that part of that road was a turnpike road, it was held that this was fatal, for the statement in the indictment was matter of description, and must be proved as laid. (v) On an indictment for obstructing a footway leading from a turnpike road to Gravesend, it appeared that from the turnpike road to the top of a hill the road was a carriage way, but from thence to Gravesend it was a footway, and the obstruction was in the latter part, and it was held that, assuming this to be a misdescription, it was amendable under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 1. (w)

Some definite track must be proved.

In order to support a claim to a right of way there must be evidence of some defined way in some particular direction:

where therefore a place had been an open place in Epping Forest, and people had always been used to go over it, as over the rest of the forest, wherever they liked and wherever they could, but there was no distinct evidence of any definite way in any particular direction, and though there were tracks from time to time, which might last for a few weeks or months, there was no beaten or enduring track which had lasted for years; Wightman, J., directed the jury that if they thought that there was no regular way, but that people merely went where they liked, they should find against the right of way. (x)

A map made by order of a former lord of a manor in which a way lies, which has been used for more than thirty years by the stewards of the manor, for the purpose of defining the copyholds, and which set out the way in question, but did not describe it as a highway, and set out other ways in a similar manner which were only occupation roads, is not admissible as a declaration by a deceased person as to a public highway; for the map, if a declaration at all, was only a declaration as to the matter for which it had been used, viz., the defining the copyholds, and the map itself did not describe the way as a highway. (y) Where on an indictment for nonrepair of a highway a map of the parish was produced from the parish chest, and the person who made the map thirty-four years before the trial proved that he laid down the boundaries from the information of an old man then about sixty, who went round and showed them, it was held that this map would have been receivable as evidence of reputation, if the old man was dead, but that it was not receivable without proof of his death. (z)

Where a person who is bound ratione tenuræ to repair a highway lives out of the county in which such highway is situate, he may nevertheless be indicted in such county for not repairing it. (a)

If the description of a highway in an indictment for the nonrepair of it be too indefinite, being equally applicable to several highways, advantage should be taken by plea in abatement; and the description given, if true in fact, cannot be objected to at the trial under the plea of the general issue. (b)

Of the defence under the general issue, and of the necessity for a special plea.

When an indictment is against the inhabitants of a parish at large, who, as it has been seen, are bound of common right to repair all the highways lying within it, they may upon the general issue, not guilty, show that the highway is in repair, or that it is not a highway, or that it does not lie within the parish; for all these are facts which the prosecutor must allege in his indictment, and prove on the plea of not guilty. that the road is as good as it ever was.

it had always been a green road, and was in very bad repair. Patteson, J., told the jury that it was not enough to say that it was as good as ever it was, or as it usually had been; and that if it were a public road, and the necessities of the public required it, the inhabitants might be bound to convert it from a green road into a hard road; it was contended that this was a misdirection, that the road was proved to be in as good a state as it had ever been, and that that was an answer to the indictment; but it was held that the direction was right; and that the degree of repair necessary had reference to the existing use of the road; if the road was little used, then little repair was necessary; but if much used, then proportionably more. (d) On an indictment for nonrepair of a highway it appeared that the road was an old soft road formed of weald of Kent clay, and had never been repaired with hard substances; the defence was that the parish was not bound to make the road a hard road, and that they had sufficiently repaired it by hacking in the ruts, as had before been the custom. Blackburn, J., told the jury that the parish was not bound to make the road hard, or bring stone or other hard substances to repair the road; but they were bound in some way, by stone or other hard substances, if necessary, to put the road in such repair as to be reasonably passable for the ordinary traffic of the neighbourhood at all seasons of the year. (e) But it is settled that the parish cannot, upon the general issue, throw the burthen of repairing on particular persons, by prescription or otherwise: but must set forth their discharge in a special plea. (f) This rule, however, was recently held not to apply to a case where the burthen of repairing was transferred from the inhabitants of a parish to other persons by a public Act of Parliament, to which all are supposed to be privy, and of which all are supposed to have cognizance. (g) Where a person is charged with the repairs of a highway or bridge, against common right, he may discharge himself upon not guilty to the indictment: and therefore where a particular division of a parish is charged with the repair by prescription, or a particular person by reason of tenure or the like, which are obligations against the common law, they may throw the burthen either on the parish, or even on an individual on the general issue. And the reason seems to be, because upon this issue the prosecutor is bound to prove that the defendants are chargeable by tenure or prescription, and therefore the defendants may disprove it by opposite evidence; but if they will, though unnecessarily, plead the special matter, it is held not to be enough to say that they ought not to repair, but they must go further and show who ought. If a parish consisting of several townships be indicted for not repairing a road within it, a plea that each township has immemorially maintained its own roads must show how much of the road indicted lies in one township, and how much in another; for
